NEW YORK FASHION SHOW

Styles for Next Winter's Wear.

Honey Yellow Is to Be One of the Colors in Vogue.

The first fashion show of the season was held last week in the Ritz-Carlton Hotel, and gowns and wraps which will be worn next winter were exhibited to an invited audience, of whom the greater number were from out of town, says a New York correspondent.

In choosing your fall hats you must make up your mind that it will be a tam-o'-shanter, a tricorne or a mandarin. Fifth avenue in November will seem to be invaded by a regiment of Harry Lauders. The hat of the winter will be a high velvet tam, worn a little to one side, and in many case draped with a tulle veil, covering the face, reaching way below the bust line and trimmed with three narrow bands of fur. One of the most charming costumes shown yesterday was of a faint V-shaped plaid velvet and revived the old fashioned apron over-skirt of the '80's. A veiled tam-o'-shanter was worn with it, the black net of the face veil edged at intervals with three bands of beaver. There are tams of all kinds to suit all faces, broad and low, with a gold ornament at the side, tall or narrow. The mandarin is a flat, brimless hat of black velvet, topped by a wreath and built on a bandeau. The three-cornered toque is offered to women who postively refuse to look like Harry Lauder, and there is also the perennial large velvet hat for women who insist on wearing it.

Variations of the pelican sleeve, with a pouch over the hand, which may prove of substantial assistance to conscienceless bridge players, appeared in many of the coats and tailor mades. By far the prettiest afternoon costume was of a brown material, called monkey skin, which has the sheen of watered silk. Perhaps the most striking feature of this costume was the King Charles sleeve which is really two sleeves, one large and of three-quarter length, finished by a wide barrel cuff of fur, the undersleeve, like a tight gauntlet, buttoning far over the hand.

Another suit fashioned of a silky pink fabric had a flaring Louis XV. front and a very long postillion back. Over this straight back was a shorter flaring back of midnight blue. The velvet seemed to carry out the Louis XV. suggestion of the front and so harmonized the costume. The pelican cuffs were of the midnight velvet. Many of the coats—nearly all some modification of the Russian blouse— had a belt starting from the side seams, crossing in front and tying in the back like a sash. All the coats had enormous Hussar collars of fur thrown around the shoulders.

To show the perfection to which the manufacturer has brought the imitation of fur two young women appeared simultaneously, one wearing a genuine seal coat, the other an imitation. Viewed across the footlights it was impossible to tell these garments apart. One coat of corduroy, alternating with silky stripes, had the wide belt tucked under the side fullness, reached the shoe tops in front and was half length in the back. A great many of these coats were built with yokes extending into the sleeve.

Italian grey, tornado blue, hunter's green and a new shade called honey predominated in yesterday's color scheme. Honey is just what its name implies and is an attempt to carry the summer craze for yellow into cloth and velvet. It is a brown yellow, however, and can be worn by the most conservative, provided she is not a blonde with blue eyes.

I do not think the attempt to gather fur, indicated by the fur fichu or surplus shown on several coats, will find favor with women. It is much too clumsy, and even when an imitation fur is used ads to the height and heaviness of the shoulders. We are a race of square shouldered women and the less we add to our shoulders' height the better. All the skirts shown in street costumes yesterday were short, not so short as the freak skirts of this season, but no longer than those women of good sense have been wearing.

Several evening gowns and negligees were exhibited which trailed the floor even in front, but I doubt if women are ready to accept this fashion.

The woman who intends to wear her last year's suit need not worry particularly about it. The skirts are still short, the Russian blouse is still worn. With just a few changes she can make herself, or have made by a little tailor, after she has looked over the fashions, she will be ready for anybody.
