LONDON, Sept. 6. LONDON IN SEPTEMBER. September in London in the Victory year is almost like a pre-war September. The West End has no unusual features except the amount of uniform that still persists in hotels and clubs. Naval uniforms, however, is becoming much rarer, and the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve has almost disappeared. There are many motor cars about, numbers of prosperous people, although they have gone to the country, coming to town often to keep in touch with business or pleasure. The restaurants are still fairly crowded. One factor that makes a big difference from pre-war times is that the Continent is still virtually closed—although the ultra-fashionable crowd is sharing Lloyd George's rustic retirement at Deauville, and so there is the more attraction to come up to London. The pressure of people with demobilisation bonuses to spend and family reunions after the war kept up dozens of feeble pieces at the theatres, for there were crowds every night who would go to any theatre where seats were vacant, but with the exception of this public in the past month or so plays have been topping. Every day new things are getting a chance at last. The city is very quiet, and the chop houses, bars, and taverns are doing poor business. Many business men are taking their arrears of holiday, finding justification in the continuance till the end of the week of the strangling embargo system and the endless difficulties so many firms have of bringing Government officials to a settlement over old deals with the Government. London is generally lounging just now, filling its lungs with sea air, and there are optimists who believe that it will begin again with new zest and power in October.

THE SUNDAY CIGAR. Is the sweet but plebeian briar not now good enough for the London workman when he goes abroad on Sunday in his new standard readymade? In a smoking car on the Underground Electric Railway, last Sunday there were 48 men, all of them smoking in one form or another the vile stuff which the Tobacco Combine now puts upon the market. Ten were smoking pipes, fifteen cigarettes, and twenty-three cigars; and the odour of springs from the same instinct as that which makes the war profiteer ostentatious, and according to Vice-countess Tepletown, causes him to send his wife into society covered with diamonds and very little else. One should not think more harshly or derisively of the workman who flaunts his profession...

More Eggs GUARANTEED. Hens are supplied by nature with eggs. But a yolk is only half an egg—nothing with her. To lay a whole egg, the hen must have a "white" for a yolk. If she is to lay 1,000 eggs, her food must contain 1,000 whites as well as 1,000 yolks—she must get "whites" just as she gets yolks, and she must get them in a form that she can use. Purina Chickens Chowder, Scratch Feed and Purina Chickens Chowder make her lay more eggs than usual. EGGS—winter and summer—we guarantee it. Purina Chickens Chowder is an ordinary feed, but it makes a hen lay so many eggs in a season that you can't get it any other way. It's the only feed that makes a hen lay so many eggs in a season that you can't get it any other way.
