NEW EXPERIENCE FOR LABOR BODIES

Taken Into the Confidence of the British Government on War Matters.

So that there may be no delay in making the essential munitions of war, on which so much depends, a conference has been held between the Government and the labor representatives, at which 75 workmen's organizations were represented.

Heppily this conference succeeded in reaching certain conclusions which will be recommended to the men represented.

The chief points were: During the war period there shall in no case be any stoppage of work upon munitions and equipments of war.

All differences on wages or conditions of employment shall be the subject of conferences between the parties.

An advisory committee representing the workers engaged in production for Government requirements shall be appointed by the Government.

During the war period the relations of the present trade practice is imperative. Any departure from the practice ruling shall only be for the period of the war.

The relaxation of existing demarcation restrictions or admission of semi-skilled or female labor shall not affect adversely the rates customarily paid for the job.

The Government also proposes to limit the profits of employers to ten per cent, and any excess is to go to the State. The labor men regard the settlement of this point as necessary corollary to the problems which the trade unions have been called upon to face.

Mr. Lloyd George, interviewed by the "Daily Citizen," discusses this conference and its decisions.

"The note of the whole thing," said Mr. Lloyd George, was the necessity of taking labor frankly into the confidence of the Government in the organizing of all industries that produce munitions of war.

"I think," the Chancellor added, "that this is the first time such a thing has ever been done either in this or any other country. And mark you, it does not end with the conference, for we have established a permanent advisory committee of labor representative with whom we mean to confer from time to time upon problems affecting the labor in the factories and workshops that are engaged in turning out war material."

"It amounts to this," said the Chancellor, "that there is now opening up a great new chapter in the history of labor in its relations with the State."

The Nation First

How a Boy Played His Part in the Great War.

(By John Gomfort.)

What was it the curate had said last Sunday, when they went down to the village for mass?

"He serves his home best who puts the Nation first."

Jean clenched his brown fists until the knuckles showed white beneath the skin.

"I must go to the village to warn the soldiers. The cattle will be lost and Marie will cry, but it is the Nation that comes first!"

He had his back towards home now and he was running as fast as he could go down through the wheat fields and through the gap to the dusty high road. An old man was sitting by the wayside doing something to his patched boots.

"The Germans are coming—go and warn someone!" shouted Jean, but the old fellow was so deaf that the boy had to go right up to him, and catching him by the shoulder, fairly shake the evil tidings into him.

When the old man understood what was wanted of him, he did not even stay to put his boot on, but tucking it under his arm, turned off through the fields to warn the next village, while Jean sped onward along the dusty road.

Down a hill, up a hill, and then the road veered to a dip again, and there he was, with the village close at hand, and a dozen dusty men lying asleep under the shade of a tall tree by the side of the road.

"Wake, wake! The Germans are coming!" panted Jean, who had hardly breath enough to make himself heard at all, and he entirely failed to wake the soldiers, who were so spent with travel and the long forced marches which had been their portion.

The landlord of the inn heard him, and came running out to demand the source of his information, and between them they roused the troop.

There were about two hundred of them, and when their captain had heard what Jean had to tell, he gave the word, and the whole troop crossed the meadow behind the inn at a run, disappearing into the forest, on their way to intercept that long, wavering line which Jean had seen creeping up through the forest ways.

"Go home boy, go home now, and it may be that you will be in time to save the cattle even yet," said the landlord, who was a kindly man, and understood what it must have cost the boy to put the Nation first.

Jean nodded, and turned away. He had no breath to waste on talking; a long mile stretched between him and his farm, and his mind was gone with the farm, and his mind was gone with the farm.

The church bell clanged in an agitated fashion—that was to call the old men and the boys from the fields, and to put the outlying places on guard. But Jean knew that the sound of the bell could not be heard at his home if the women were still indoors, for old Gascoyne was deaf, and never could tell the angelus from the sound of a cow-bell in the upper pastures.

Jean had a horrible pain in his side, there was a thrumming as of drums in his ears, and his feet were so heavy to lift that he caught himself counting the steps as he took them.

He had reached the fields again now, then dashing through a piece of standing wheat, he made for the woodland. There was a short cut here, and if only he made haste, he might succeed in driving the beasts into the forests before the enemy crossed the meadows of the farm.

Desperately he plunged through the lush undergrowth of the little belt of woodland, and just as he was emerging on the side nearest to the farm he heard the watch-dog begin to bark, and a minute later the sound of screaming was borne to his ears across the sunny pastures.

"They are there!" he shouted in his despair; and as if to confirm his utterance, at that moment there came the shrill squealing of a pig that was being slaughtered.

Jean came to a sudden halt. If the troop were busy with a pig, the cattle might escape attention for the moment and there were twenty beasts in the meadow below the house, out of sight of the windows. Surely if he tried very hard he could get these under cover of the forest before the enemy had finished with the pigs.

At least it was worth trying for Jean darted through another piece of standing corn. At ordinary times it would have been reckoned little short of a crime to do things like these, but the cattle were worth hundreds of francs, and he must save them if he could.
