At dead of the night, alanna, I wonder over and over, shall you part from your field fredund, to also on a strunger shore? You'll break my heart in the leaving. Hee many a mother I know—Just God, look down upon Eria and lift her at lust from her woo!

At dead o' the night, alanna, I see you in future years. Grand in your strength, and noble, facing the wide world fears; Though down in the mossy churchyard my bones to under the sod. My spirit shall watch you, darling, till you come to your rest in God

In the Apple Orchard.

Festora, in her long, white apron-and big san hat, color box and palotte in hand, sauntered out first the orchard and sat down under the shad-of an apple tree. A light breeze stirred the boughts on which the sanilght gleamed in great gold patches and countiess songlitch acted from limb to limb, making the air vecal with their mixed.
