

THE BEARING SEA

It is his letter to Lord Salisbury, which was published last week, Mr. Blaine finds a new ground upon which to rest his claim that the United States has the right to prohibit seal-fishing in the Behring Sea beyond the three-mile limit. It is found in an Act of Parliament passed last year prohibiting certain methods of fishing in a bay 2,700 square miles in area on the northeast coast of Scotland. Though it is probable that none but Scotch fishermen ever fish in this bay (which is about the size of the Chesapeake), Mr. Blaine contends that by the wording of this Great Britain assumes control over the fishing operations conducted by the subjects of other nations as well as those of Great Britain. It is hardly likely that Lord Salisbury will admit this. The difference between the case of the Scotch bay and that of the Behring Sea is that in the former none but British subjects are affected by the legislation, so that national law suffices; while in the latter the subjects of both the United States and Great Britain are affected; and therefore international law alone can suffice. We fear that Mr. Blaine in shifting the ground upon which he stands has only shown that he stands upon shifting ground.

We are glad to see, however, that he readily accepts Lord Salisbury's demand that the question, what damages are due to Canadian sealers shall be added to those which are to come before the Arbitration Commission, and the subject of the sealers' claims, which is the subject of the Commission's report, shall be referred to the United States. He is the United States' ally in this. He is the United States' ally in this. He is the United States' ally in this. He is the United States' ally in this.

which are used on Alaska territory. To what extent British sealers are allowed to fish in the Behring Sea, is a question which is now being considered by the Arbitration Commission. No man knows how desperate a woman can look until he has seen her undertake a ride a bicycle.

The heart's youth does not pass, as long as its purity and innocence remain. We scar our own hearts by the cherishing of sentiments we are directed to expel; we become discontented and call our discontent knowledge; we forget that all knowledge, which does not increase our happiness, is egotism, and not to be trusted. How strong are the heart's first struggles under sorrow, how it battles with distress and wars against despair and disappointments; how vigorous its efforts to combat and overcome; but sorrow is the stronger—ay, sorrow is the stronger—it is drawn into the heart by the first breath that we inhale of this world's air—a small seed, but still it grows and grows, and twists and twists, until it crushes the poor heart; and then, then we die!
