

dians, and end in the like disaster to themselves.

THE risk and difficulty of carrying provisions and stores through a wilderness of some hundred miles, and that distant from resources and supplies of all kinds would be subject to embarrassments easily foreseen, but ill to surmount, and liable to the fate of Burgoin and his army, in every corner the attempt could be made on that province. "Whoever seeketh to attain unto this end by crooked cunning, will find that by this left handed wisdom he will at least lose his way," nor is it likely that such an attempt will be made, while it is well known that half a dozen of British frigates, and as many bomb ketches, could lay every town of note in America in ashes in one day.

To explain this article it may be necessary to mention that all the old fortifications were erased to the ground, and not a gun now mounted in that whole continent but such as are in the possession of the British.
