The Daily Hint From Paris

We are inclined to judge a child's success by his standing in class, and by the number of examinations he passes. It is vastly easier to cram facts into a boy's head, so that he will be successful at a test, than sit is to really interest him in the subject. And without this interest in what he learns his education is in a sense a failure. If a child is thoroly interested, he edu-cates himself. In this respect we see the value of play and playthings. Chil-dren love toys, and things, foey, can play with by themselves. Toy's interest him, they appeal to his sympathy, his originality, his patriotism; and thus thru his emotions they direct his thoughts; thru his thoughts they edu-cate his will.

Cate his will. Children exercise their imaginations in their play with toys. They live the life suggested by the toy, and they tend to become like that which they constantly imitate. It is said that na-tions famous for their artists, artisans in and idealists supply, their children e and idealists shoply their already their children with toys. Not only does the toy direct the child's education along emotional lines, but it forms the connecting link be-tween his little world and the broad world of reality. He learns much of animals from his toy menagerie, he learns of countries and people from his olocks, soldiers and pictures for past-ing. He takes great interest in helping little sister look after the doll-bouse and family. Thus his toys and games show him his relation to a wider life. And now, mothers, have these two talks on the value of play helped you to understand the necessity of guiding the toys? If we were not such busy, busy mo-thers nowadays we would not dare to miss that wonderful joy that comes from perfect understanding between mother and child-the understanding that comes from playing together which means character-building and conquering together.
