

Dr. Jack's Wife.

Doctor Jack believes success comes to him who deserves it. He has little reliance on luck, though ready to accept any chance that presents itself.

Noting the unruly element in the crowd that gathered about the ship, he congratulates himself in the wisdom that has led him to don certain garments such as vulgar sunbonnets.

This fact seems to well later on, and even now he finds progress made much faster on account of it.

Swearing is decreasing near, when Doctor Jack, drawn by some singular fate passes over the deck of the ship.

Just below the deck of Yankee sailors emerge from a cabin. They are not only not inclined to be noisy, as sailors on shore-leave may always be expected to prove, singing catches of songs, joking and laughing.

Again hard luck. A squad of Chilian sailors from the war vessels are passing by, perhaps under the influence of liquor.

Doctor Jack is made aware of the fact that he is an object of ridicule to numerous fellow-beings when some one jests him rudely.

Of course, he is fairly able to look out for himself. One under such adverse circumstances during the past few years that there is nothing new to him in finding around him angry men striking right and left.

Of course, he is fairly able to look out for himself. One under such adverse circumstances during the past few years that there is nothing new to him in finding around him angry men striking right and left.

Doctor Jack has been very much annoyed to find himself in the midst of what he as first judge to be a drunken brawl on a large scale.

With each passing minute the situation becomes more and more desperate. The Baltimore's men are pushing in the direction of the landing, knowing their only chance of escaping complete annihilation is in getting aboard.

Some officers have appeared upon the scene. They are not willing to quell the riot, even when assisted by certain Chilian officers who see the terrible results of this conflict, which may bring down upon them the vengeance of an outraged government at Washington.

He improves it, anxious to be about his own business. What else matters to him just now that the Chilian mob has set upon those who wear the garb of the United States Navy, and that their act seems to be winked at by the police.

The police advance up the cable slowly. It has actually taken them half an hour to get over a few squares. As the whole city is filled with the raging tumult there is no chance for this tardiness, except intentional delay.

How a few Yankee sailors have been caught separated from their companions and beaten with cudgels, stabbed with knives, and treated in a degrading manner, considering the fact that they are all unarmed. Had it been otherwise Valparaiso's streets would have run red with blood, for these Americans must have done terrible execution in the crowd, armed for business.

otherwise when the character of the mob is taken into consideration. One of these sailors has been struck down, and his comrades seem to be dragging him in the direction of a drug store, while shots and stones are rained upon them, people in the houses even taking pleasure in deluging them with dirty water.

CHAPTER XI. During the confusion that fills every alley adjoining that in which these desperate scenes are being enacted, Doctor Jack manages to escape the scrutiny of the infuriated mob that so relentlessly pursues them with the pertinacity of wolves chasing their quarry.

He believes the Yankee sailors will reach the Mob, and their vessel—the presence of several naval officers gives this idea strength. Probably the Chilian report will be made on a friendly place for Americans in the near future.

Of course, Jack feels somewhat brought up over the matter. For once he admits that he is a trifle nervous, as much depends upon the arrival of Kirke in his own person. So he comes to the minutes and speculates, as a wise man may, upon what his course should be in case of disappointment.

Larry will probably carry out his share of the programme, and must wait at the rendezvous. Doctor Jack wishes he had sent Avis aboard the steamer. Then she would be safe at least, whereas this must always be an element of uncertainty about it.

He remembers the man who longed to wed the widow of Doctor Jack—remember him with a smile of contempt, and yet an uneasy feeling. Lord Rackets Pympton is not a man to be sneered at, and in his character of a cultivated rationalist may do an immense amount of mischief.

Again he walks back to the rendezvous. A dark figure is standing there, and sudden hope springs into his heart that it may be Kirke. To his disappointment it turns out otherwise, and as he glances sharply at the party he sees a native, who looks curiously at him.

"You looked for me here?" surprised. "It is I, Kirke." "He—ah, at last—you mean Kirke Smith?" "I mean the gentleman who gave me a handful of real, and who said you would be like when you read it."

"I need help—played the fool for once and lost my grip. Trust this man as far as you dare—but come. It is still safe, in my danger. Make him show you the way. All clear here."

"I'm all a fog now, as any rate. With the lumberman and Angler were discussing the advantages of coming for their purchases to-day, and they could not care just what they wanted for their respective work and sport on the river."

Jack keeps a bright lookout for squalls. He has not fully made up his mind as yet whether this fellow can be trusted, and will be governed a good deal by circumstances. At the same time he does not sleep on the way, and his hand keeps in touch with the weapon he carries.

Messrs. M. & J. HICKEY sell Kirke Smith's shoes, and the doctor strains his eyes looking down the call to notice the most naturally come. This delay can have but one meaning—the messenger has been followed by a spy more shrewd than himself who has waylaid him on the road back, waiting for the coup de grace until he has in his possession the coveted package.

Jack moves down in that direction, hoping to meet the party messenger. Here and there he pauses, for upon the back of the city some of the desperadoes live; these very hills that so recently belled forth the reverberation of cannon, as the Congressional Army besieged that of the Dictator, Balboa.

They crown upon him now, outlined against the heavens, but strain his eyes as he will there seems to be no sign of Kirke. Again he walks back to the rendezvous. A dark figure is standing there, and sudden hope springs into his heart that it may be Kirke.
