Market is Unusually Bare of All Supplies

There is very little fresh fish in the market at present, and if anything, less cured fish. Probably for years there has never been such a dearth of fish as there is at present. While it is usual to experience a stiff market during Lent the present situation is much more severe than anyone anticipated. There is a small quantity of halibut on the market and some cod and haddock. The latter is being imported from Boston, where it has been kept in cold storage since last fall.

The price of cured codfish has advanced from $3.50 and $3.75 to about five dollars. This is unprecedented in this city. From present indications it would seem that the present stock will be explayed long before the new resident of that locality on whom he five dollars. This is unprecedented in this city.
