Women Who Insure.

According to a successful woman insur more insurance is being taken out by women every year. "They are now considered good risks" she says "whereas formerly a woman had to pay an extra premium to secure insurance. About six years ago that hindrance was removed, and now nearly all of the life insurance companies accept them on the same basis as men. One of the old conservative companies just yielded the point a flow weeks ago, but still makes an exception to married women, as several of the other companies do. The mortality among women is no greater than among men, and their liability to accident is not so great. As for the class of women that take out insurance, I suppose that trained nurses and women physicians have a larger percent age than have other professions. After that come the teachers in schools, ther dressmakers, milliners, cashiers, clerks it department stores, and others, but very few storographes. dressmakers, milliners, cashiers, clerks in department stores, and others, but very few stenographers. It is a singular thing that we always find it difficult to convince a stenographer of the value of life insurance. Professional women are more apt to insure than others, and insurance has recently become popular among act resses. They are taking out twenty-year endowment policies as investments for old age. As a rule, actresses do not save their money, and do not have anything

As a rile, actresses do not save their money, and do not have anything left after their popularity has passed We insure a good many women in private life also. It is becoming quite common, and very soon as many women as men will take out policies upon their lives, particularly those who have others dependent upon them."

Mrs. Leland Stanford, it is said, carries a larger amount of insurance than any other woman in the world. Her policies amount to more than a million dollars. Mrs. Frank O. Lowden of Chiego carries $250,000, probably more than any other woman in the West, and Mrs. McReynolds carries $200,000. Helen Gould and one of her sisters have $100,000 each. DRUGGISTS and OPTICIANS. * Offers to Sell Stonehenge.

Bir Edmund Antrobus has, through Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice, Chairman of the County Council of Wiltshire, made a definite offer to sell Stonehenge and eight acres of the land occupied by these mag-nificent Druidic ruins to the English Government for $250,000, on the undernificent Druidic ruins to the English Government for $250,000, on the understanding that they will be preserved for the nation. Some years ago Sir Edmund made an offer to dispose of Edmund and twenty acres of the land on which the great stones stand for $750,000 to any one who is willing to pay that price, and great alarm was expressed lest some American multi-millionaire might purchase the celebrated megalithic monuments and carry them off to the United States. But this fear has not been realized. Sir Edmund's desire to get rid of Stonehenge is in no small measure due to the annoyance to which he has been subjected in the last few years in connection therewith. It was shortly after his accession to the baronetcy and estates on the death of his father in 1899 that he determined to surround Stonehenge, which forms part of his property, with a barbed wire fence, and to charge an admission fee of '25 cents, his object being to protect the stones from the injurious treatment to which they were being subjected by people without any reverence for the hoary past. Moreover, as some of the stones were in danger of failing he feared that in the event of anybody being injured thereby he might be held financially responsible. Exception, however, was taken to his attitude. It was said that inasmuch as Stonehenge had lain open to all the world since English history began, the public had acquired a right of way through every poglion of the grounds on which the stones stood, and likewise a proprietary interest in the stones themselves. Then, too, it was pointed out than anything in the shape of a modern inclosure destroyed the spell created by the aspect of those immense stones standing along in strange circles far from human habitation in the midst of a vast, open, rolling plain. And the result was that not only the general monuments raised a fund with the object of testing in the courts not Sir Edmund's proprietorship of the ruins, but his right to inclose them with a wire fence.

Sails of "Length Chasers." In view of the talk about the immense spread of canvas on the Reliance and the new Shamrock, it will be interesting to learn that in Australia a little 22-foot cockleshell-like Wonga carries 3,425 square feet of canvas aloft when she is running in a slightly quartering breeze. Charles MacLaurin, a well-known New South Wales yachtsman, in writing of these "Length Chasers," as they are known in Australia, says:—"They are extraordinary affairs altogether. There are five sires, $, 10, 14, 18 and 22 feet. The type is similar in all-broad, shallow boats, with powerful bodies, to carry the most colossal sails surely ever put upon mortal fabric of wood, iron and copper. The escape from death of Captain Engellandt of the German from sailing vessel "Erndte," news of which is reported from Dantzic, will hardly find its equal in the annals of life-saving. The "Erndte" left Memel with a cargo of timber on April 16. During the next two days the vessel was exposed to a very rough sea, which kept the crew of four men at work day and night. On April 18, just as the captain had retired to his cabin, the storm suddenly became so violent that the vessel capsized. The crew were swept sway and drowned, and the captain was imprisoned in the ship's hull, the hatches having been closed tightly by the sudden pressure of the water. The wreck drifted along, keel uppermost, until April 30, when it was sighted by the Norwegian steamship "Aurora" off the fishing village of Rixhoeft. The steamship immediately proceeded to secure the wreck, and while thus engaged the crew heard repeated knocks from the inside against the iron bottom. They also noticed a noise resembling a human voice crying "Help." The Noews hardly accomplished, when a human finger appeared in the opening. Then Captain Engellandt announced himself to the astonished sailors as safe and sound within the ship's hull. He said he had food enough for three days, but during the last 24 hours had been compelled to drink sea water because the tanks were empty. The Norwegian steamship's artificers were not prepared to make the hole in the iron bottom large enough to permit of the imprisoned man's liberation, and therefore the wreck was towed to Dantzic. Here the vessel was raised, and thus ended Captain Engellandt's caption, and therefore the wreck was towed to Dantzie. Here the vessel was raised, and thus ended Captain Engellandt's captivity, which lasted twelve weary days and eleven nights. The hardy seaman is none the worse for the fatigues he underwent. During the day he worked hard to make his presence inside the vessel known to passing ships, but at night he slept peacefully with the water underneath and the iron roof above. The old squire lay a dying, and his faithful coachman was summoned to the bedside. "Well, John," said the old gallant, "I'm going now on a longer journey than ever you could drive me." "Never mind, squire, never mind," cried the servan, in a broken voice; "it'll be downhill all the way."—London "Globe."
