

A line drawing of a small wooden shed. It has a gabled roof with diagonal shingles. The front features double doors with vertical planks and four small square windows. The sides of the shed are covered in horizontal planks. There are three steps leading up to the double doors. The drawing is simple, using black lines on a white background.

My garden is all marked in rows for planting after a thorough cultivation similar to that given for field roots. The horse-hoe is run through the rows as soon as possible after each rain, or once a week if at all possible. If impossible, I take a rake or hoe and go over the rows. I prefer the rake after a rain, as it pulverizes the ground better. If there is any special part of the garden I wish to rush, I hoe it every day. If no other time is available or the days are very hot, I get up early and have a
