Lady Marjorie's Love

"My good child, as the most sen- things, human or otherwise, Jack v

"My good child, as the most sensible thing you could do would be to marry him and make yourself virtually the mistress of the Holt, I have no doubt you do," Lady Marlingford returned with her former resignation. I really can't compliment you on your common sense, Marjorie—you seem to me to be curiously lacking in that respect. But your poor father was just the same, as your present most unfortunate position sufficiently, proves, I am sure. Well, it is of no use going into that; the mischief is done, and we are both reaping the fruits of it. You had better go out this morning; your headache has made you look wretchedly pale."

Marjorie mechanically left the room; the shock was still vibrating through every nerve of her body; she felt stupid, sick. The Countess, as the door closed, gave an impatient laugh, "The little fool," she ejaculated, with angry contempt. Will nothing open her eyes If Loftus Bligh did not come here yesterday deliberately meaning to break off that most ridiculous engagement, I am as blind as she is.
