Russian Press Comments.

Many people in this country will be rather surprised at the view of Mr. Gladstone's general policy taken in high diplomatic quarters in St. Petersburg. The writer in the Political Correspondence remarks that Mr. Gladstone's foreign policy certainly justifies the discontent it has aroused in England, but adds that the world must not suppose it to have been correspondingly admired in Russia. On the contrary, Mr. Gladstone is declared to have been neither frankly hostile to Russia nor really specific, to have been neither frankly hostile to Russia nor really specific, to have inclined and the spin of the spin of the special will be proposed to the many of Canada will then be, either to join in the Federation of the British Empire only but of the British Empire only but of the British Empire only but of Canadians as much about our centralized power of the States is not. "Mr. Gladstone's tergiversations," proceeds the semi-official writer, "and the slowness of his negotiations had ended by creating as "much irritation and suspicion in Russias as they did in England."

When we are enabled to see ourselves as others see'us the view is usually more or less surprising. The partisans of the late Cabinet will probably be consoliderably astonished by this candid judgment, although the feeling will hardly be shared by dispassionate critics. It is quite possible to stand up stiffly for one's own rights and by external respectance of the r for one's own rights and yet to re tain the respect and even the good extends to trade. By the operation Men of business cannot understand that sort of thing, and they infallibly end by ascribing to trickery and bad faith what is only the result of weakness. Their exasperation is the more inevitable if they are plied with dialectical arguments when they want to deal with facts, or are they want to deal with facts, or are ment they are almost untouched.
