"If you please, sir," said the boy, "all work and no play is its own reward. Hence, a burnt child gather s no moss." "Heighho!" exclaimed the gentleman. "You seem to have your copy-book very well committed. Pray, wh at is your name?" "Mike Muller, sir; think you k indly." "Not a brother of Maud?" pursued the gentleman. "Ay, indeed, sir," said Mike, wi th a smile. "She lives hard by in the great house, and I in yon lowly cot." "And are you contented?" asked the gentleman. "Oh, yes, sir," said the lad. "For when one is happy one need not be well off, or even rich. All is not half a loaf that glitters." "But, surely, my fine lad, you envy those you behold possessed of wealth and case?"

"Does this mean." said the gentl eman, "that you prefer to thrive by the sweat of your own brow?" "Why, no, sir." confessed Mike. "I am already thriving by the sweat of Maud's husband's brow, for which I am very much obliged to her. A friend in need is worth two in the bush." "I think I understand." said the gentleman. "You have a sinecure, or soft snap as it is called. Your sister married the judge, after all." "Alas, no," corrected the lad. "The judge lies under the willow in the churchyard yonder. He died and left all his wealth to his son. You see, a penny saved is soon parted." "But what then, noble youth, b ecame of Maud?" "Ah, sir," murnured Mike, "it is an ill wind that butters no parsnips. She married the judge's son." "How true," sighed the gentleman, clucking to his horse. "And how true also that procrastination improv es each shining hour."
