But, in spite of her sufferings, those two words "my darling" were continually ringing like sweetest music in her ears, and thrilling her heart with a strange new happiness. She was dimly conscious that it was she was dimity conscious that it was not wise, perhaps, for the son of the wealthy Hamilton Vining to learn to love her, a poor girl, but it was very sweet to feel that she had won Clifton's weet to real that she had won critish and the sheart for the house of the hor critish and the sheart for the hor critish and the sheart for the horse of the horse critish and the sheart for the sheart for the horse critish and the sheart for th great, true heart; for in her girlish en-thusiasm she had idealized him some-what beyond his merits, while she knew henceforth he would be all in all

She was thoroughly exhausted by pain and weariness when at last they reached the landing, where carriages were se-cured and all the unfortunate excursionists went their several ways to their

It was rather a forlorn drive back to Abby Knapp's humble dwelling, although that estimable woman several times quaintly asserted, and with a positive-ness not to be mistaken, that you'd never catch her on any kind of water craft again so long as she lived.
"Just you let me feel the solid earth under my feet, and I can manage to take care of myself," she remarked, with a deep breath of thankfulness that at last she was upon a firm foundation.

Shirley smiled faintly at her observations, but she was too far spent to respond to them, and she was thankful enough when she at last found herself snugly tucked in bed, while Abby, who was now restored to her usual tranquil rame of mind, bustled about to minister

in a far more thoughtful mood than was habitual to him.

The day had been one of revelation to him, from beginning to end—revelation of the unusual beauty of Shirley's character, and of his increasing love for her. All the afternoon, during their trip up the Sound, he had been impelled to tell her of his affection; but somehow he had a feeling that he was not worthy of her. and he dreaded to put his fate to the

He had always been impressed with a sense of her superiority, for his had been an aimless, pleasure-seeking existence, without a thought regarding the deeper concerns of life, while it was evident to him that Shirley had been thoughtful and conscientious beyond her years, improving her time and advantages to the utmost, until she was far in advance of until she was far in advance of

His intercourse with her had set him to meditating upon questions which had never given him the slightest concern never given him the slightest concern heretofore, and he was thus undergoing a sifting process which was liable to do him a great deal of good.

How unselfish she was also! What strength of character, what heroism and self-abnegation she had shown that very day, while they were on that burning steamer! What a great, generous, loving heart she must possess! How tenderly she had cared for those little children, who had been left so helpless. children, who had been left so helpless, telling them stories to take their minds from their danger, and thus making them quiet and tractable.

Then how calmly and intelligently she had assisted in transferring them to the boat, resolutely refusing to leave herself until they were all safe! He found her sitting up and looking very sweet and lovely, in a pretty blue wrapper, although she was quite pale, for her burns were still very painful.

She flushed rosily, however, when Abby announced Clifton, for she could not forget his impassioned words of the pre-

"Your position is far above mine, socially," Shirley returned in a low tone and with downcast eyes. "Your parents are wealthy, and, if I can judge from Mrs. Knapp's description of them, exceedingly aristocratic. Would they approve of of what you have just been saying to me?"

A glad, almost exultant, light leaped into the young lover's eyes at these words. She could not say that she did words. She could not say that sne and not love him—she was only conscientionally considering whether she would marr his prospects by confessing it.

NEW YORKER MINUS STOMACH

That Organ Successfully Removed From a Patient.

Digestion Will Go On, However, in the Duodenum and the Intestines-Cancer at Each End of the Stomach.

[New York Sun.] The operation of gastrectomy or removal of the stomach was performed at the German Hospital in Brooklyn the other day on Jacob Wichman. Though the patient was in very poor condition to undergo so severe an ration he stood it rather better than the physicians had expected. It is too early as yet to know whether the operation was successful to the extent of saving Mr. Wichman's life, but the probabilities are that it was. The operation was performed by head surgeon of the hospital with the assistance of the hospital staff. For reasons of professional delicacy the account of the operation was furnished to the newspapers with the under standing that the name of the surgeon should not be published. The operation was made necessary by the fact that Mr. Wichman had cancer of the stomach. It is the opinion of most eminent authorities that there is always a time in the growth of any cancer when it can be stopped by the use of the knife. Some cancers, one of these authorities said yesterday, develop so insidiously that their presence is not detected or recognized until it is too late to operate on them effectually. It was determined by the usual tests for cancer that there was every probability that Mr. Wichman, who is very old, had cancer. He was told that his only chance for life was that he submit to the operation for the removal of the stomach. He consented to the

A day was appointed for it, but just before the surgeous were to begin their work Mr. Wichman's son, who had become much excited by the preliminary accounts of the operation printed in the newspapers, made a protest. He served written notice on the hospital that his father was feeble-minded and not responsible for himself, and that the operation was forbidden by the next of kin. The hospital felt safe in disregarding this notice, which was not regarded as accurate, but it was determined to let the matter go rather than to have a fuss. A day or two later a letter came to the hospital for the younger Mr. Wichman. It fell into the hands of the elder man by mistake. He found it a communication from a man in Maine whose father, 70 years old, had been through the operation success-The old gentleman showed this to the son, and the son came to the conclusion that the surgeons, after all, knew what they were talking about. He fairly begged for the operation. He served a second notice on the hospital revoking his prohibition, and did everything to induce the hospital to Yesterday his try the operation.

wishes were complied with. A comparatively new form of anaesthetic, adapted particularly for use with old and feeble persons, was used. This is the simultaneous inhalation by the patient of chloroform and oxygen. The oxygen stimulates the patient and counteracts the weaken-ing effect of the chloroform. The following is substantially the account of the operation as given by one of those who were present: "An incision was made in the abdomen and the stomach was found and brought down into the wound. should be explained to laymen that the stomach is well above the abdomen in its normal position.] Owing to the emaciated and consequently lax condition of the stomach it was quite easily brought down. It was found to be diseased in two places. This is not usual. Usually cancer of the stomach is found to be in the middle of the stomach. In this case it was found at the place where the food enters the stomach and also at the place where the food leaves the stom-This had confused the symptoms which had been reported by the patient. He had complained of difficulty both in swallowing and in getting food out of the stomach.

"It was then decided that only com-ger of poisoning from a possible leakage of the contents of the intestine into the organs might be avoided. All the connection of the stomach and the other organs except those which joined it to the intestines and the aesophagus or swallowing tube were then severed. Those were left to the last so that the two tubes might not remain open any enger than was necessary. The stomach was tied with strings at each end near the clamps and then a cut was made between the strings and the clamps and the stomach taken out

"The two tubes were then brought together and joined. The end of the aesophagus had been unduly dilated by the efforts of the patient to force food into his stomach, and it was necesary to make it smaller. A housewife would say that we took a tuck in it. The two tubes were sewed together with eighteen stitches and then were wrapped with a part of the loose tissue of the peritoneum. "This will take hold quickly and should be partly grown to the other parts within a few hours. The organs were then restored to their normal positions and the wound was closed." For a time the only nourishment the patient can take will be peptonized condensed milk mixed with water and eggs, but in time he will be able to digest everything that does not need pepsin for its digestion; such things will have to be predigested for him more or less. Salt water will also be used to give the system moisture and for the general invigorating effect of its application. It will be several weeks before the patient will be able to take food through his mouth. The operation of gastrectomy is frequently confused with that of gastrotomy, which is the far simpler operation of opening the stomach for the removal of incipient cancers or for the purpose of looking for them.

According to an eminent surgeon who talked with a Sun man about the removal of the stomach yesterday, the ack of a stomach is not a formidable matter. The duodenum performs almost all of the functions of digestion except such as require the pepsin processes. The lack of the presence of the pepsin juices of the stomach is obviated by peptonizing the food before it is eaten and to that extent predigesting it. "Modern science," said this surgeon, "has exploded the theory of the usefulness of the stomach. It is astonishing even to men well acquainted with the operation to learn how much a patient without a stom-ach can eat—how many things, that is to say-and how little predigesting preparation of food is necessary."
