The writer, while admitting that "corners" may have caused certain fluctuations in trade during recent years, holds that the fact has not been clearly proved by those to its repression. That the effect of "fu- popular, protectionist side of the trade tures" has been to render fluctuations in question, just as the liberal or radical party prices more violent the writer denies, and so extended a system of trade as the dealing in wheat, corn, cotton, etc., for future when we might expect to see a correction delivery, is utterly impracticable. The system of "futures," he maintains, trade that to meddle with the one would be up to delude reform leaders still further and dangerous to the other. At present, he says, the merchant miller is enabled to buy at the beginning of the year contracts for the fature delivery of grain and at the same time to sell the year's product of flour at a the delivery of yarns at certain prices est far more than of opinion.
