"Decline and Fall of Keewatin."

From the London Advertiser.

Bengough's promised satire, the Decline and Fall of Keewatin, or the Free Trade Redskins, has been published at Grip office and is now in the hands of the booksellers, price 15 cents. The manuscript was found in the deserted country north of the great lakes, written on tanned buffalo skin, and it tells why the former inhabitants, the Kanucks, left their hospitable land and cast in their lot with the southern neighbors who maintained a high wall about their territories to protect their own basket makers. The argument is a first-class protectionist manifesto, and the illustrations are in the highest style of the art. We find, ornamented with feathers and armed with bows and arrows, Big-Push, the chief of the Puritee; Clean-Hands, head of the Toerees; Goldwing-Arrow, a skilful marksman; Critty-Saud, Chief of the Council; Rib-Stabber, a treacherous and remorseless brave who loved to get at the fifth rib of an enemy; Cartwheel-Dick who sat on the money-box; Shifing-Aurora, a speaker of sweet words; White-Quill, jr., a volatile young brave; the Early-Duffar, chief of all the Kanucks; Smooth-Scalp, a servant whom Big-Push gave to Critty-Saud; Wild-Wind, a Toeree Medicine Man; Bun-Stir, a Toeree Brave, and some others. Besides the ones who are presented with their feathers, reference is made to numerous other historical characters, such as Grinding-Mills, Working-Ox, and Steamboat-Hugh in Keewatin, and Slippery Fish who belonged to the Spread Eagles. An extract would not do justice to this witty brochure, which must be read and seen to be appreciated. When we say unhesitatingly that it is Bengough's best, there can be no doubt that it will attain a very wide circulation. A glance at Clean-Hands standing on a stump, or Big-Push with his legs doubled far up toward the knee is alone worth the price of the book.
