

The Breaking Point

By Mary Roberts Rinehart

So he carried with him the children and slippers, the dressing-gowns and bed-sacks which were the tangible evidence of their friendliness and Lucy's despair.

Watching him, Dick was certain that nothing further had come to passage his recovery. He had carefully inspected the mail, but no suspicious letter had come, and as the days went on, David's peace seemed finally re-established. He made no more references to John Hopkins, slept like a child, and walked almost pettishly at his restricted diet.

On the night before the departure

David went out for his first short walk alone, and brought Elizabeth back with him.

I found a rose walking up the street, Lucy, he bellowed up the stairs, "and I brought it home for the dinner table."

Lucy came down, flushed from her final effort over the trunk, but gently hospitable.

"It's fish night, Elizabeth," she said. "You know Minnie's a Catholic, so we always have fish on Friday. I hope you eat it."

She put her hand on Elizabeth's arm and gently patted it.

Elizabeth taken into the old brick house as one of its own.

Elizabeth was very happy those days, although things had seemed rather odd at home since the night of Dick's visit, and although Dick himself puzzled her at times.

He came every day, sometimes twice indeed, and she knew that her family was recognizing a tacit engagement.

But for all that it was settled, it seemed strangely unsettled, too. By some tacit agreement even Nina had not been told, or Jim. She did not want to tell that, although it bewildered her, Her own inclination was to shout it from the house-tops. Her father had simply said: "I've told your mother, and we'd better let it go at that, for a while. There's no hurry. And I don't want to lose you yet."

But there were other things. Dick himself varied. He was always gentle and very, very tendered, but there were times when he seemed to desert her, almost fiercely. But after that, as though he had tried an experiment in separation and failed with it, he would catch her to him savagely and hold her there. She tried, very meekly, to meet his mood; was submissive to his passion, and acquiescent to those intervals when he withdrew himself and sat or stood near her, not touching her but watching her intently.

She thought men in love were very queer and quite incomprehensible. Because he varied in other ways, too. He was boyish and gay sometimes, and again silent and almost brooding. She thought at those times that perhaps he was tired, what with David's work and his own, and sometimes she wondered if he was still worrying about that silly story. But once or twice, after he had gone, she went up-stairs and looked carefully into her mirror. Perhaps she had not looked her best that day. Girl-like, she set great value on looks in love. She wanted, frantically, to be beautiful to him. She wished she could look like Beverly Carlyle, for instance.

Two days before David and Lucy's departure he brought her her engagement ring, a square diamond set in platinum. He kissed it first, and then her finger, and slipped it into place. It became a rite, done as he did it, and she had a sense of something done that could never be undone. When she looked up at him he was very pale.

"So long as we both shall live," she repeated.

However, she had to take it off later, for Mrs. Wheeler, it developed, had very pronounced ideas of engagement rings. They were put on the day the notice were sent to the newspapers, and not before. So Elizabeth wore her ring around her neck on a white ribbon inside her camisole, until such time as her father would consent to announce that he was about to lose her.

Thus Elizabeth found her engagement ring, very noisy over the fish and David's broiled lamb chop. Dick demanded a bottle of Lucy's homemade wine, and even David got a little of it. They toasted the seashore, and the departed nurse, and David quoted Robert Burns at some length and in a horrible Scotch accent.

When Dick had a trick by which one read the date on one of three perales while he was not looking, and he could tell without failing which one it was. It was most mysterious. And after dinner he took her into his laboratory, and while she squinted one eye and looked into the fender of his microscope, he kissed the white nap of her neck.

When they left the laboratory there were people in the waiting room, but he held her in his arms in the office for a moment or two, very quietly, and because the door was thin they made a sort of game of it, and pretended she was a patient.

"How did you sleep last night?" he said in a highly professional and very distinct voice. Then he kissed her.

"Very badly, doctor," she said, also very clearly, and whispered, "I lay awake and thought about you, dear."

"I'd better give you this sleeping powder," Oh, frightfully professional, but the powder turned out to be another kiss. It was a wonderful game.

When she slipped out into the hall she had to stop and smooth her hair before she went to Mrs. Crook's sitting-room.

It was Jim Wheeler's turn to take up the shuttle. A girl met in some casual fashion, his own youth and the urge of it, perhaps the unconscious indulgence of an only boy—and Jim wore his bit and passed on.

There had been contention in the Wheeler family during all the spring. Looking out from his quiet windows, Walter Wheeler saw the young world going by a wheel, and going fast. Much that legitimately belonged to it, and much that did not, in the kindness of the old code, he lent to the automobile. And doggedly he refused to buy one.

"We can always get a taxi," he said in his imperturbable answer to Jim. "I pay pretty good-sized taxi bills without counting the cost. I know you pretty well, too, Jim. Better than you know yourself, and if you had a car, you'd do well not to break your neck in it."

Now and then Jim got a car, however. Sometimes he rented one, sometimes he cajoled Nina into lending him hers.

"A fellow looks like a fool without one," he would say to her. "Girls expect to be taken out."
