Selected Literature.

Cupid on Change.

Chaffer gave a start; but the recollection of the check in his pocket in a measure composed him. He, at any rate, would be a gainer on the whole.

"There's one consolation, though," Prigg continued. "Those rascals, De Bruin & Cubb, who did so much to run the stock down, I see got caught on Soapbubble Preferred and have failed for a million."

"Whew!" whistled Chaffer, whose check, of course, was worthless.

It was now Prigg's turn to ask what the matter was. Chaffer made a clean breast of it. What was to be done was the next question.

"First of all, keep our secret," suggested Chaffer; "next, you must marry the widow or Miss Sparks, without a moment's delay—but what about this?—glancing at a paragraph which had just caught his eye—Kite & Co., too, have gone up." Didn't Miss Sparks keep her money there?

"Of course she did—I found that out a month ago."

"Then you must marry the widow."

"The widow be it," said Prigg, with a sigh of resignation.

And the widow it was. She offered no coy ploys for delay, and the nuptial knot was speedily tied.

"A—!"—the fact is, stammered Prigg over his coffee one morning—"I find myself decidedly short at present, my dear, and—if you only could now—that is, you see, your check for a thousand or so—"

"Nothing could give me more pleasure, Percy, dear," interrupted the widow, "but you see, that provoking Endless Track—"

"What!—did you, too, put your money in it?"

"Every cent I had in the world, Percy, dear; but then, you know, you and every-body said it was so safe, and that the money would soon be trebled."

I would have mentioned the thing before, but I didn't wish to mar this happy season by speaking of such trifles."

What Percy, dear, would have said next, had he dared, I'm afraid would not have been in print.

It didn't soothe his feelings to learn that Minnie Sparks, who didn't lose her money after all, having drawn it from Kite &amp
