passed us, dvance to. e entreaties d the veil re discover. the daugh. nan, and the the land. an oppor. per charms, id searches among the xcluded us she now, d rank, iner father's duce us to d the offer. at evening the lovely in the mean n with the ve, by the n the heart nd for his ded, as far bandsome affectionate 1 the love t Violante to Gerrsion. A he lovers, rner in this ression !ity of feel-Violante's ninate dissounds of e submitg the Gerl whilst he with our , new and ninated in great dess of these rils in this attentive us Lindan, love-blos-, without ther wish. iggest the ir union;

very thing was accordingly prepard for Lindan to make a formal proosal to her father. He thought ith trepidation of the important day : ot that he had any cause to appreend a refusal, against which his nk, his fortune, and his faith in the oman Catholic religion, protected m, but he dreaded the ceremonies f a court presentation, and all that llows such a step. Poor Lindan, ou wast spared all these formalities. ut in a far, far different way from hat thou hadst anticipated or wishd! Some time had elapsed since a oung Frenchman had been introuced to Violante's father. We at rst overlooked him in his commonlace courtliness; but he soon suceeded, by means of some pretty anzonettes, and some stale jokes, e emptiness of which constited their most prominent quali-, to raise himself into notorie-. Lindan met this new apparition ith friendly affection, his cheerful nd unassuming disposition reflectg every new formation of the huan mind to its best advantage. Neertheless, the foreign youth soon ecame troublesome to us. The ommon-place courtliness, which had first modestly stood back, raised self to higher and more assuming stions, until it gained, no one could ell how, the highest place in the asembly, and circumscribed and supressed every expression of genius as ell as originality, under the pretence f gratifying all, whilst it, in reality, ratified but its own spokesman. indan grew silent and reserved company; a song from Vioante, a solitary walk with her, reompensed him for many a tireome hour spent in the now monotoous circle. He scarcely noticed he young Frenchman's wish to gain iolante's love, and when he did, e merely smiled at it, as an extraagant undertaking. I felt differently. saw but too clearly how much the ranger gained in Violante's eyes, nd how much the sweet plants, hich Lindan fostered in her mind, lost thereby. Daily one of the tender blossoms faded, and at last there sprung up so many Parisian tulips. that a German forget-me-not, and a proud Italian rose, could but seldom raise their heads. Lindan, for a long time, shut his eyes, as if intentionally, to this melancholy change. One evening, however, he sought me after leaving the circle, and his eyes were filled with tears. 'I fear. Bernwald,' said he in a low voice, ' I have lost her !' I was silent, but a deep sigh escaped my troubled breast. ' And yet,' continued he, ' I must strive for her as long as I am able. Such a paradise is not so easilv resigned.'

"After this, Lindan's behaviour towards the Frenchman grew serious, nay, almost hostile. He openly attacked his pitiful shallowness, but the adversary always effected his escape. The circumstance, that most of the phrases which the smatterer uttered, passed his lips without being understood, and left his heart without being felt, was as great an advantage to him. as oil to smooth the body is useful to the wrestler, while it prevents his antagonist from obtaining any where a secure hold of him. We lived melancholy, annibilating days!

" One fine mild evening assembled us all on the terrace in front of the Villa, The night rose so majestically out of the sea, spreading slowly over the yet faintly illuminated earth, while a few stars were smiling down upon us from the azure sky, that we all, wrapped up in deep admiration, unconsciously grew silent; even the Frenchman's indefatigable tongue ceased for a moment its exertions. Lindan was seated next to Violante ; an ardent desire after the love he had lost, and the happy days that had gone by, coming over him, he asked the beautiful girl for a German song, which she formerly was wont to sing with great emotion.

"The general silence caused the Frenchman to overhear his words; and, without waiting for Violante's