ROBBIE'S VICTORY.

Rob Preston put on his coat and hat, and came out of school very slowly, with a perplexed, troubled look on his bright, sunny face. Some of the boys were already outside, and were whispering and laughing about something. Rob evidently knew what it was, but had no wish to join in it; still, instead of hurrying away, he might have done, he lingered irresolutely.

But they would not hear a word from a little boy like me, he answered. 'Then you must help Annie. The poor little thing will be frightened if they laugh at her.'

Rob walked on a few steps. What should he do! Oh, dear, why couldn't he go right home? He could not stop them, they would probably only laugh the more if he did anything.

'But Annie will feel as if she had a friend!'

'I can't,' said Rob, with a little choke; and, boy that he was, his eyes filled with tears as he turned toward the gate.

'O, Rob Preston, I'm ashamed of you,' said the faithful inward monitor. 'How shall you feel when mamma takes your face between her hands to give you a good-night kiss, and calls you her little laddie? Will you want to look up into her face? Won't you feel ashamed to think what a coward you have been? Shall you want to tell her about it? O Robbie, he mamma's travel little laddie.'

There was just a minute's hesitation, then Robbie, turned and went quickly up to the steps

Rob evidently knew what it was, but had no wish to join in it; still, instead of hurrying away, he might have done, he lingered irresolutely.

The gruff was Robbie was fighting a real battle within himself. There was a little Annie Hoffman, her father was a miserably drunkard, and they were so poor as poor could be. Her mother did her best; but poor little Annie was a pitiful sight in her faded, outgrown ragged garments.

Rob had discovered in some way that a few of the rougher, more thoughtless boys were proposing to make some fun for themselves when she came out of school to go home, and all the afternoon his conscience had been pleading earnestly with him.

'You ought to try to stop them,' he said.

'But they would not hear a word from a little boy like me, he answered. 'Then you must help Annie. The poor little thing will be frightened if they laugh at her.'

where Annie stood, quivering with fear.

'Come with me, Annie, I'm going your way,' he said; and Annie caught hold of his arm instantly.

'I'm so afraid,' she almost sobbed. 'I'm never coming again. I didn't want to come to-day, but another cried and wanted me to.'

'I'll tell you,' said Robbie, reassuringly; 'we will go right to my home, and tell my mamma. She always knows just what to do.'

So they went bravely down the walk; and though the boys tried to laugh, they could not make much of a success of it. Somehow, Robbie's sweet, wistful face touched them.

Mamma soothed and comforted little Annie, and sent her home happy, with one of her own Annie's outgrown dresses that just fitted her, and a promise to come and see her mother.

When she had gone, mamma stooped and kissed Robbie.

'My own precious laddie, my little man,' she said fondly.

'But I wasn't brave at first. I wanted to run away like a coward. I'm ashamed of you, and how ashamed I should be to have you know about it,' said Rob.

'That was right, dear; but remember God sees and knows always. Mamma might not, perhaps; but we cannot hide anything from Him. Think of that when you are tempted. We must try very hard not to do anything we are ashamed or sorry to have God know, mustn't we?'

'I'll try, b, O mamma, some time it is so hard even to do right in little bits of things.'

JIMMIE M'NIEL'S SCRAP BOOK.

It was a pretty picture Dr. Welden saw as he entered Beth Ashley's room. The sunbeams, which had been streaming in through the broad south window, had just found their way over the soft window to Beth's couch. There they lingered lovingly among her golden curls, as much as to say:

'Here's our little playmate; but what keeps her so still? Why doesn't she fly about as we do? If the good doctor had under-

Mr. Ashley's interest was not lessened by his call at the home of little Jimmie. Before night came, the cellar of the little home held more coal and wood than it had ever seen at any one time before.

Little Jimmie spent many happy hours poring over the pictures in the scrap book, and when his hard-working mother heard him laugh out merrily over some awfully funny picture, she would exclaim: 'God bless the kind little lady!'

It was not long before Beth was her merry, active self again, but she never forgot the happy hours she spent in making Jimmie McNeil's scrap book.—'Child's Paper.'

Lawn and Household MANURE.

Many people consider the subject of manure making and its application to the soil as being something below their dignity, as that it should be left for the ignorant and uneducated. This is a great mistake, for if we view it in the light which the science of chemistry has thrown around it, we will find that it is a most profound study, and one well worthy the attention which the most learned men which the world has produced have given to it both in their teachings and writings. They realized that the success and prosperity of the country depended upon the production of a bountiful supply of food for the plant, and that the supply cannot be maintained if the fertility of the soil is allowed to become exhausted.

Any intelligent person will admit that no country can stand the constant export of plant food that the export of grain and stock to the other countries has caused without becoming impoverished in time. Indeed we already hear the cry that the crops are becoming poorer every year, that the land will no longer pay for the labor of cultivation, and that the people are forsaking farms because they will no longer yield sufficient returns to provide food and clothing for the farmer and his family. Is it not, then, time that we should call a halt and seek ourselves the question: Is there no remedy for this state of affairs, or is this country too rich in natural resources to sink into a state of barrenness and sterility? That such a disastrous result can be prevented, if we bestir ourselves before it is too late and use the materials of nature as placed at our hands, is shown by the condition of the farmers of England, whose land has been cropped from time immemorial and is to-day yielding larger crops than ever. In this country we also have a few examples of men whose land is to-day yielding more bountifully than it did when the soil was turned for the first time; therefore, our constant study should be to restore the loss of the past and to prevent, for the future, the exhaustion of our soil.

When our forefathers began the cultivation of the virgin soil they were astonished at the apparently inexhaustible store of plant food which it contained, consequently they cropped it without mercy.—They apparently did not realize that the most fertile soil, if continually cropped without some form of plant food being added, must eventually become unproductive.

It will be of no use for us to blame our fathers for overexploiting the soil by selling everything and retaining nothing, for doubtless they did the best they could under the circumstances; they had many handicaps to contend with in building a home for themselves in a new land. If, instead of blaming others, we look around for a solution of the question, we shall find that, with all the stored up science and knowledge of years at our command, and with our fathers' example to warn us, we are doing but little better—that, in reality, we are but following in our father's footsteps, and still further completing the ruin which they began. We complain about hard times and high taxes, but if we were to examine closely, we would find that Canadian farmers are wasting more from neglect of the manure piles than would pay the entire tax of the Dominion of Canada.—'Farmer's Advocate.'
