How Warships Cut Cables

IT IS NOT SO SIMPLE AS IT SOUNDS.

The plucky dash of H.M.S. Amethyst through the Dardanelles, in order to cut the submarine cable linking up the Turkish forts on the European with those on the Asiatic side of the Straits, serves as a reminder that, despite the advent of wireless telegraphy, cable cutting in war is still under certain circumstances, a matter of great importance, worth sacrificing valuable lives to accomplish. In the days before Marconi had perfected his wonderful invention, it was, of course, even more vital than it is now. To sever an enemy's submarine cables, and to thereby isolate it from the rest of the world, including its own colonies, was then one of the prime objects of a naval commander.

Thus when war broke out between Spain and the United States of America on April 23rd, 1898, Admiral Dewey immediately cut the cable between Hong Kong and Manila, and hurrying with his battleships to the latter place, attacked and destroyed the Spanish feet lying at anchor off the city before its commander was aware of his presence in the neighborhood.

Cables are Cut in Two Places. Dewey's feat in this instance was undoubtedly a smart piece of work, for cable cutting is by no means so easy a job as it sounds.

Briefly the method is as follows: The cruiser detailed for the work steams slowly at right angles to the cable route, dragging after her a special kind of grapnel, like a five-pronged anchor with shears attached, which grip and cut the cable at the same time. This grapnel is connected with the cable-cutting ship by a strong rope formed of strands of steel and hemp interwoven and attached to which is an instrument called a dynamometer, that shows when the cable is hooked.

By steaming once or twice backwards and forwards, the cable can be cut in two places at, say, half a mile apart, and the severed portion can then be dragged away by another kind of non-cutting grapnel, and left lying on the ocean bed at some distance away, where it is, of course, impossible to locate it, rendering any attempt to repair the damage a very difficult and laborious operation.

Such is the usual method adopted for destroying an enemy's cable in comparatively shallow water and was probably that followed by the Amethyst, with possibly certain modifications due to the proximity of hostile forts, and the presence of mines. In the case of ocean cables submerged at great depths, however, the mode of procedure is somewhat different.

They Take Many Months to Repair. A similar five-pronged grapnel is used, but it is a non-cutting one, and simply grips the cable, holding it fast. The fact that it has been hooked is, of course, notified to those on board by the dynamometer, when the ship is immediately stopped and the cable hoisted up towards the surface.

It never reaches the surface, however, for presently the lifting strain becomes too great, the cable snaps of its own accord, and the two ends flying wide apart, the severed cable settles back to the ocean bottom obliquely, leaving a gap of possibly a thousand yards or more between the portions.

Of course, the wilful destruction of a deep-sea cable after this fashion is a very serious matter; how serious may be gathered from the fact that it cost somewhere about £60,000 to properly repair the damage done by Dewey to the Hong-Kong-Manila cable mentioned above. The Aden-Dombay cable, again, broken accidentally in a depth of 1,900 fathoms, was only repaired after 251 days of strenuous work, in the course of which 76 miles of new cable were used. While a repair of the Lisbon-Cornwall cable, broken in the Bay of Biscay in 2,700 fathoms, took 215 days and used up over 300 miles of new cable.

In view of these figures it is not surprising that several attempts have been made to arrive at an international agreement for making all submarine cables neutral in time of war. So long ago as 1888, indeed, a conference having this end in view was held in Paris, and in the following year a convention was signed at London by the representatives of no fewer than twenty-six States, including all the great European Powers.

Nevertheless, the experience of the present war, as well as that of others which have preceded it, has shown pretty conclusively that there can be no such thing in practice, however beautiful in theory may be the principle involved.

The New Brunswick Legislature has passed the liquor license act by making the hours that bars may sell from eight a.m. to 8 p.m. daily, except Saturdays, when closing is at four p.m. It was also made illegal to sell liquor to soldiers or officers in uniform, or partly in uniform.
