The Nugents of Carricoma

An Irish Story.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ARTHUR AND A FRIEND TALK CONTINUALLY.

Arthur and his wife were back again in Dublin, where they had been for a day or two of sight-seeing and shopping. Their return had been delayed a little on Anthony's account, but that respectable man had continued unmoved, and Lady Frayne had said she could no longer dispense with Arthur's assistance at Doyle's. His father's obduracy, which Kitty treated as a joke, affected Arthur seriously. It was not at all to his liking, neither had it been any part of his scheme, to settle himself as a dependant upon Lady Frayne; but his present allowance from his father was insufficient for a comfortable married maintenance.

Arthur was galled in his spirit and in easy; he had had a right to expect an only son's portion from a wealthy father. The course he had taken had seemed to him a quite legitimate method of attempting to force his father's hand; its failure or success so far was the most annoying and disquieting that he knew for how long a period Anthony was capable of maintaining his ground; and if this disappointment could not have been said quite to have overshadowed their honeymoon, it had hung over Arthur, at least, like a little cloud in his serene.

Kitty's enjoyment was full and complete. She said twenty times a day that she did not care twofold where or how they lived, since, in whatever circumstances, they must at any rate live together; unimpeachable honeymoon sentiments, which course were greatly unbecoming to Arthur. Kitty had him all under her own control; took on little airs of authority, on the plea that Arthur was still an invalid, and must be doted and otherwise kept within bounds, which meant that he must never go out without his wife. To all of which Arthur submitted with exemplary contentment.

A day or two after their arrival in Dublin they met in Grafton street an old school friend of Kitty's, who, hearing that he had just returned, insisted on taking her home there and then to afternoon tea for a further and more detailed recital, Arthur being dismissed to return to the hotel alone. His way took him past his father's bank; and in sight of the bank he was startled at seeing his father leave it, staggering under the weight of the celebrated and mysterious portmanteau. He had a car in waiting for him on to which, with the assistance of the carman, the bag was hoisted and Anthony, taking his seat beside it, was driven off. Arthur, standing with in the shelter of the shop door, had watched the proceeding.

When the car had disappeared down the street an impulse seized him to enter the bank, the junior partner in which had been a college friend of his at Trinity.

The bank was just closing and the junior partner on the point of leaving.

John Treddler, the junior partner, was son to the principal, and the bank of Treddler & Co. had transacted the Carricoma business for generations.

"Your father has just been here," said Treddler's friend to him.

"He has?" said Arthur, who did not care to say that he had just watched his father's departure from the bank.

Treddler, from Treddler's words that his father had evidently made no mention of his marriage, Arthur went on to communicate that piece of information, and to receive the rather astonished congratulations of the junior partner.

"Why, he never said a word about it," said Treddler.

"He's never got over it himself yet," said Arthur. "So he's been here again to-day."

"Yes, we've seen a great deal of him lately. But, I say, where are you going, Nugent? Are you staying in town?"

"For a day or two," answered Arthur. "Look here, we are not five minutes from the hotel, come over and have a chat. Stay and dine if you will."

"Can't dine; but I've got an hour to spare, so let's go across."

As they went to the hotel Arthur deliberated how he could best say what he had on his mind without confessing his entire ignorance as to his father's affairs. His friend, however, smoothed the way for him by remarking suddenly:

"By the way, Arthur, I don't believe I've seen you since you came home, that's to say since the Carricoma balance went up so suddenly. Nice luck for you to get a wife like that and a fortune within six months."

"Well, I've got the wife anyway," laughed Arthur, "and to a man of my taste that's the better part of the two. But between ourselves, up to the present, I haven't seen a great deal of the fortune."

"Oh?" said his friend, "then what has your father been drawing at such a rate for?"

"Gad! I know a great deal less about it than you do, Jack," returned Arthur, not feeling too comfortable.

"But you know how he's been drawing on us, I suppose?"

"Not a bit," answered. And having said this much, he was compelled to say more.

"The fact is, my dear fellow," confessed Arthur, "we none of us know what has come to the old gentleman lately. He spends no money on the place, and as far as we can see none on himself, and talks as if he were poorer than ever. He bought a telescope, and rigged up the tower as an observatory, and engaged a lady to teach him astronomy; but these have been his only visible expenses, and they can't have amounted to much."

"That's odd," says Treddler; "for I may tell you in confidence—in strict confidence, of course—that your father has been reducing his balance steadily for a long while past. That venerable portmanteau has become a joke in the bank; but he has carried away thousands in it."

It was Arthur's turn now to express amazement.

"Thousands!" he cried; "you must be joking, Jack."

"It's a fact, upon my word. My governor said the other day that your father must be graving Carricoma with gold."

"What in the name of wonder can he be doing with it?" asked Arthur.

"Our only idea has been that he is making secret investments," replied Treddler; "it's a fascinating game when you begin it."

"Yes, and a precious risky one, I should think, for any one so ignorant of it as the old gentleman must be. Why, he never had a shilling to invest until he got this money from my uncle. What does he know about investment?"

"Would you like me to say anything to my father?" asked Treddler; "he might say a word to yours on the subject. Only, as you know," he added, "we, of course, cannot prevent him doing just what he pleases with the balance he has at our place."

"No," replied Arthur; "and what is worse, I am afraid nobody can. But I don't see that any mischief can be done if your father were to say something. He knows him well enough to be able to do that."

"I'd better tell my father, I suppose, that I've seen you," said Treddler.

"Yes, you can tell him that; only don't let my father know that any suggestion came from me; he won't be in town again just yet, I expect."

"He has been to us every ten days or so for some months past," said Treddler; "this was all he said upon the subject, and the conversation passed to Arthur's marriage, and his prospects therewith connected. Treddler had left before Kitty returned. Arthur decided to say little to her in reference to what he had heard; he would talk it over first with Barbara."

CHAPTER XL.

A WEDDING AND A STORM.

Dora had not left herself much space for self-questioning, or debating, as to whether she should, or should not, marry Treddler. She had, in effect, given him her answer on the night when they met upon the road. But she did, of course, consider with herself once again, and deeply, before she went in answer to his letter. True, she could not well have retreated at this moment; on the other hand, she had not, upon full and final consideration, any desire to do so.

To begin with, she was in love with Treddler, and that would at any time have been reason enough for her. On the practical side, she would gain what it had been one of her chief objects in life to gain, since the days of her poverty in Paris, the use of solid comforts of a healthy home. Neither had she much to fear for the future as touching Treddler's financial future, added to his own moral strength, would aid him to redeem himself.

So on the evening of the day that she received his letter she sat down and wrote that she would marry him.

Breakfast was scarcely over the next morning when she saw his tall little figure coming up the drive. He carried his arm in a sling, and walked rather slowly, but there was animation in his face and cheer in his voice as he cried "good morning" to Anthony, who was just setting out from his house. Treddler turned about with him, and they paced the drive together.

FUN, FACTS AND FICTION.

A lady says that the difference between a silk dress and a calico gown is material; but that's all stuff.

Among the pains and aches cured with marvelous rapidity with Dr. Thomas' Electric Oil, is ear-ache. The young are especially subject to it, and the desirability of this Oil as a family remedy is enhanced by the fact that it is admirably adapted not only to the above ailment, but also to the hurts, disorders of the bowels, and affections of the throat, to which the young are specially subject.

A Dinner Pill.—Many persons suffer excruciating agony after partaking of a heavy dinner. The food partaken of is like a lead upon the stomach, and instead of being a healthy nutriment it becomes a poison to the system. Dr. Farnesley's Vegetable Pills are wonderful correctives of such troubles. They correct acidity, open the secretions and convert the food partaken of into healthy nutriment. They are just the medicine to take if troubled with indigestion or Dyspepsia.
