A BOOK FOR MOTHERS

Containing Much Information as to the Care of Children, and the Treatment of This That Commonly Afflict Little Ones—Given Free.

"Baby's Battles: A Message for Mothers" is the title of a very handsome little pamphlet issued by the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company. It is devoted entirely to the care of infants and small children, and tells the mother how to aid her little ones in the emergencies of every day life. It describes the ills that commonly afflict children, and tells how to treat them. This little book is one that should be in every home where there are infants or small children. All mothers who send their names and address on a postal card to the Dr. Williams' Medicine Company, Brockville, Ont., will receive this work free of charge. Mention the London Advertiser when writing.

MIX-UP OF NAMES.

Toronto, May 22.—In a dispatch of Saturday's date reference was made to a decision of the master in chancery in a lawsuit for repayment of $7,000 loaned on stock of the Farmers' Loan Company. By a mix-up of names it was stated that the company loaned the money was the one that had failed. The failure referred to was that of the Farmers' Loan and Savings Company, and this occurred some years ago. The other company interested is one of the strongest financial institutions in Toronto. The case will be appealed.

BERLIN FURNITURE COMPANY ASSIGNS.

Berlin, Ont., May 22.—The Berlin Furniture Company made an assignment yesterday to Philip Gies. A meeting of the latter was held on Saturday when the firm's offer to compromise at 33 1/3 cents on the dollar was declined. The company's liabilities are about $45,000, and assets about $51,000. The largest unsecured creditor is Mr. Gies, whose claim is between $1,800 and $1,900. This firm erected one of the finest furniture factories in this province, and had only been operating about seven months.

A WONDERFUL PIPE ORGAN

Novel Instrument Installed in Residence of Dr. W. H. Moorhouse.

Player Requires No Skill to Produce the Most Difficult Compositions—How It Was Built.

Dr. W. H. Moorhouse, dean of the medical faculty of the Western University, has had installed in his beautifully-appointed residence at 249 Queen's Avenue, one of the most extraordinary musical instruments ever manufactured in America, or as a matter of fact, in the world. It is a magnificent pipe organ, similar in every detail to the instruments constructed for churches, but voiced on a lower pressure of wind so that the volume of sound shall not be too great within the compass of the smaller room in which it is placed. The wonderful thing about this organ is the fact that, though it is in itself a perfect instrument in which the most skilful pipe organist could delight, it may also be played by any novice whose knowledge of music does not reach beyond the love of it. The marvel is accomplished by means of a device which the ingenious mechanical contrivance whose wooden fingers may be made to touch the key-board with as much feeling and expression as ever human fingers conveyed. This instance is, so far as is known, the first in which the "Angelus" has been attached to a pipe organ. True, pipe organs have been constructed that can be made to play by means of a mechanical device within them, but never before has an attempt been made to attach the "Angelus" to an ordinary pipe organ.

Dr. Moorhouse is an ardent lover of music, more especially that produced by the pipe organ, and it was this predilection for the kind of instrument which led him into a minute study of organ construction. Mr. T. C. Wright, the London manager of the Nordheimer Piano and Music Company, was consulted, and as a result his concern undertook what then appeared to be the doubtful experiment of supplying a perfect pipe organ with an "Angelus" attachment, which would enable anyone not possessing a technical knowledge of music to play upon it. The organ proper was built to order by Edward Lye & Toronto, the famous manufacturers of church pipe organs, and the "Angelus" was supplied by the Nordheimer Company.

The attaching of the "Angelus" to the organ was a difficult one, but Mr. Edward Lye, who personally superintended the work, was equal to it, and yesterday the completed instrument was given a practical test. The most difficult compositions were played with rare precision and expression, and it is needless to say, Dr. Moorhouse is delighted with the result.

The organ, together with the "Angelus" and the pipe attachment, is probably the most complete instrument made in the world, and it is a permanent term—ever made by a Canadian firm. It has two manuals and independent pedals, and what is known to musicians as the "speaking front," which is practically indestructible, and all the stops are of full compass. All the wood in the organ case is the finest quality of mahogany. The bellows, which is operated by the Ross motor, a wonderfully compact little device, is placed in the basement of the house, immediately beneath the organ, so that the slight noise made by it when in operation cannot be heard in the music room above.

Great utilization of the "Angelus" as a pipe organ attachment opens up an alluring range of possibilities. The "Angelus" is not a musical instrument, but the "Angelus" of music. It is to the unskilled lover of music a means to gratify his passion for the "concord of sweet sounds." One may have music within his soul without being able to perform upon an instrument. Who has not wished for skill to draw from the pipes of an organ the melody that lies within them, awaiting the master's touch? The "Angelus" is not the master, but rather the medium by which one may become the master.

LUMBERING ON LONDON'S RIVER

An Industry of the Thames Little Known to Londoners.

Floating Logs to Chatham and Detroit Mills—The Work of the River Driver—The Sinking and Raising of Walnut Sinks.

The mention of the lumbering industry of Canada is apt to suggest to the mind of the average Londoner the towering giants of the primeval forests of the valley of the Upper Ottawa, the rapidly-developing region of New Ontario, and the back-lying districts of Quebec. A vision is called up of sturdy choppers laboring through the long months of winter in felling the tall denizens of the forest, of straining horses urged on with shouts as they draw the logs to the frozen river brink, of the breaking up of the ice in spring and the rush of the released waters carrying with them the hoarded timber of the winter. The fancy pictures, too, the agile river drivers as they leap from log to log and, pike-pole in hand, balance themselves upon their plunging, shifting supports. The imagination follows the logs as they float down the tributary streams to the larger rivers, where they are gathered into huge rafts, and towed either to the mills where greedy saws fashion them into the lumber of commerce, or to the points where they are loaded into ships or placed upon trains for shipment to distant places.

ON THE THAMES.

Probably one of the last rivers that the average resident of this city would associate with the carrying on of lumbering operations is the stream which flows past his own door. It is nevertheless a fact that the lumbering industry of the River Thames, while not of sufficient proportions to attract any considerable attention, even from the residents of Western Ontario, has an importance of its own to certain sections lying along the bank of the river for some twenty or more miles above Chatham. A visit to the river there will show, in places, the banks lined with piles of logs of considerable size, waiting the time when they are to be rolled into the river and floated down to their destination. These logs are cut during the winter on the wooded lands on each side of the river, and are hauled on sledges to the river bank. Each log is stamped on the end with the initial or mark of the firm buying the timber, so as to render possible its identification.

FLOATING THE LOGS DOWN.

When the spring freshets have subsided sufficiently to make the floating down of the timber a safe and easy matter, the logs are rolled into the water and allowed to float down for a distance. When this is being done, the river is seen dotted for miles with these unwieldy and leisurely voyagers. As the current of the river grows more sluggish and slow the farther down one goes, the progress of the floating timbers is necessarily tardy, but none the less sure. When they have floated far enough down to reach the region of the river where steam navigation is possible, the logs are collected and surmounted by the boom. These booms are made of long logs into each end of which are driven old horseshoes, which make an admirable staple for the chains or cables which bind them to each other. The logs thus formed are then taken by tugs and drawn either to the sawmills at Chatham, or even to the river across Lake St. Clair and down the Detroit River to the big mills in the suburbs of Detroit, where they are converted into lumber.

THE RIVER DRIVER.

The lot of the river driver on the River Thames is not altogether a happy one. He escapes, to a large extent, the numerous and exhilarating experiences of his counterpart on the more impetuous streams of the northern lumber regions; but this very fact makes his work more monotonous and wearying. His duty is to see that the logs maintain an uninterrupted progress down the river, and when one of them strays ashore and remains lodged on the banks he must push it into deep water again, or when it grounds on one of the numerous shallows, rocks or unkened logs in the river bed, he must wade out, swim out, or other wise get to it and dislodge it from its resting place. Altogether it is not an inviting means of livelihood, and one individual was found who expressed his opinion of it in the following terms, delivered, however, with a drawing manner that might have indicated an equal dislike for almost any other form of labor: "No more river-drivin' for me. Ef I find that I can live without doin' any more of it, I'm a-goin' to do it."

HOW LOGS SINK.

The wood of the walnut tree, used so extensively in the manufacture of furniture, forms a large proportion of the timber. At present, it has also been made to float logs of the button-wood tree down, but such is the density and heaviness of the wood that it sank almost as soon as placed in the water. The same qualities, possessed in a lesser degree by the walnut, render the logs liable to sink if left in the river any length of time. One end of the log generally sinks first, and becomes lodged in the bottom of the river, while the other end remains at the top of the water, a menace to rowboat traffic and an obstruction to other logs. Gradually this upper end becomes waterlogged too, and the piece of timber is entirely submerged.

RAISING SUNKEN TIMBER.

There are men who make a living by moving up and down the river, locating these sunken logs and restoring them to the owners, receiving for them a sum equal to half the value of the timber. So expert do these men become that it is said they can, by thrusting the steel tip of their pike-pole into a sunken log and then smacking it, determine what species of wood it is. Many farmers along the banks also collect the logs which become lodged upon their lands, and resell them to the owners, at the same terms as those received by the log-raisers. The submerging of the walnut wood does not injure it, and it is said that logs have been raised after being under water for 20, 30 or 40 years, and found to be still sound and perfect. In spite, however, of the many logs that are raised yearly, there are yet many thousands of good and valuable timber lying at the bottom of the River Thames and Lake St. Clair.
