CHAPTER V. AND LAST. There were deep sorrow and gloom at the Beches; Isobel was dangerously ill, and the shadow of death seemed hovering near.

A telegram, sir. Sir John tore off the envelope, read the telegram, and with an exclamation of surprise, started up.

After a minutes' hasty consultation Sir John rang the bell furiously and ordered the doctor to come at once; and he had just time to explain hastily to Lady Fane and drive off to catch the train, which was puffing into the station when we arrived.

It was a long journey—many hours must elapse before we could reach the little out-of-the-way country station from which the doctor had been forwarded. All was shrouded in darkness; in vain we talked and conjectured as the night-mail sped on.

Charlie Austin still lived. In the cold gray dawn of early morning we stood by his bed in the little cottage which he had taken after the accident.

"He may linger a few days," he whispered, "but he cannot live." I think I had never seen a face that had changed so much and so suddenly as Charlie Austin's.

"He has forgiven you," said a low, deep voice, tremulous with feeling. And Harold

Vivian, his eyes full of tears, and a look of unutterable love and pity on his face, came forward and knelt down by the side of the dying boy.

He caught her hands in his. "Darling, Heaven has been very good to us. When I went down to the Beches, and stood and looked at your face lying so white and still, I prayed that you might be given back to me, and you were Isobel—back from the brink of the grave."

Isobel's eyes glistened with happy tears; she laid her hand on her husband's arm, and they paced the deck together, laying many plans for the future, while at times, in low, subdued voices, they spoke of the past.
