

of this spectacle, the early rise of pauperism in the midst of us, but this much may be said, that with pauperism existing everywhere in the land, and with its sources well known to all, there does not seem to be, on the part of sick poor, an excuse for their condition sufficient to touch and cause to flow those springs of benevolence which are latent in the community.

When hospitals and refuges were founded and endowed by wealthy individuals in times past, the condition of the poor was more pitiable than it is now, their prospects seemed absolutely hopeless, and to provide for their succor in their time of sickness was a worthy aim in the eyes of all; on the other hand, in our days, and in this community at least, we are not so satisfied with the powerlessness of the poor. Nay, by many who are giving daily proof that they are not selfish and hard-hearted, the poor are thought to have their place made too soft for them; indolence and dissipation are thought to be receiving their most direct encouragement from the charitable, and it is difficult to present the claims of a hospital to our wealthy neighbours on the score—the beneficence of the object.

And yet, let the cause of poverty be what it may, vice or misfortune, the act of lightening its weight, of lessening its attendant suffering, is, when discrimination is used, certainly an act of beneficence, and though our aid to a strong and healthy idler may lawfully be limited to good advice, to the same man when he is sick, or maimed, our help must be of a more substantial kind.

It may be allowed that private benevolence, though it has done much at various times, and in various places, has never been equal to the help of this sort which has been required, and it may hardly be expected that it ever can be; its efforts are necessarily limited and fitful, while the evil to be met is on every hand, and is always growing.

Hospitals to serve the purpose required of them should be numerous, placed within easy reach of those who need their service, not so few and far between as to render it necessary for sick people to make long and painful journeyings in order to get them. It is not too much to say that every town of
