There were some human touches about the coronation and its ceremonies which relieved it from its solemn strain. The coming of the Prince of Wales was a heart-touching event. Both at the Abbey and in the procession the Prince and Princess Mary and the three young princes were models of healthy human children.
When the Prince of Wales, resplendent in his new robes of Knight of the Garter, came up the great aisle and passed to his place one's heart felt for the lad. Only seventeen, and weighted so soon with this awful obligation. A cricket sweater would

But nothing could spoil the freshness of his face or the clean and manly look in his eyes. And when on their return to the palace through the cheering crowds that lined the streets, a still louder cheer went up for the four bright boys and the sweet young princess, the picture was beautiful. They were so well-behaved and yet so frankly interested in all about them that blessings were called down not on them alone, but on the sensible and unusually capable mother who that day was crowned queen not of the British Emprie alone, but of all good British learts. When the Prince of Wales paid homage to the king on the throne he rot only touched the drown and kissed the cheek, but the father drew the son to him, and the young lad suddenly kissed the land that held the sceptre of imperial sovereignty. That human touch of father and son was good to see.
