THE PRINCE OF WALES
MODEST, RETIRING

Slips Away For Battlefront Unannounced, With Only One Aide.

IN TOUCH WITH PUBLIC

Heir To the British Throne Passed "Vacation" in Inspecting War Plants That Supply Empire's Armies.

"The Prince of Wales," said the Court Circular, "attended by Captain and Lord Claud N. Hamilton (Grenadier Guard), has left the palace on his return from the front."
The event and the announcement of it only after it had happened, were characteristic of the way the members of the royal family go about their business. If ever there was an occasion that lent itself to popular appeal this assuredly was one. The thought of the heir to the British throne in the supreme crisis of British history returning to the front to resume his share of the perils of the mightiest struggle in human annals, would have moved all men's hearts and imaginations. Had the prince of London known beforehand that he was going he would gladly have thronged the streets to give him a send-off. The while local in form, would have been national in the feeling behind it. The Prince, had he chosen, could have driven from the palace to the station between cheering and enthusiastic crowds, the central figure in a popular pageant, and could have started on his momentous journey with the good wishes of his fellow countrymen ringing in his ears.

But that is not his way; it is not the way of the House of Windsor; one is not the British way. There was no display, no bid for applause, nothing that could even remotely suggest self-advertisement. The Prince slipped away unannounced and unnoted, just like any ordinary officer, and the public did not even know he was going until he had gone.

The Prince of Wales must have taken back with him many pleasant recollections of his leave in England.
The last few weeks have brought him as closely in touch with the people at home as the last three years and more have brought him in touch with the soldiers at the front. He has visited Wales, Cornwall, the Clyde, hospitals and munition works; he has taken his seat in the House of Lords; he has become inevitably a public figure in whom all are interested; there is no doubt that he will arrive at some definite impression of his character and temperament.

No one doubts that the Prince is shaping more and more well. Born into one of the happiest, least ostentatious, hard-working households in the land, the son of a father who was a soldier and a man of duty and of a mother whose warm-heartedness and practicality have never shone forth so clearly as in these grim days, he began his life under the soundest and most wholesome auspices. His education continued and confirmed the good start that birth and heredity had given him. "There is no place in the world," William IV. used to say, "for making an English gentleman like the quarter-deck of an English man-of-war." The Prince was thrust early, first at Osborne and then at Dar-mouth, into the strict democracy of the British navy; and the lessons in orderliness, self-restraint and duty that a boy there learns—apart from the supreme lesson that being a Prince is not everything—are of the form character along honest and many lines. Oxford and Paris and the specialized intensive training that all in his position have to undergo completed the Prince's education. He was the formal part of it, and turned him out a good average specimen of hardy, clean, natural English youth.

But his real education only began with the war. From the first moment of its outbreak he had but one ambition—to get out to the front, and the weeks he spent in fighting Lord Kitchener, and tradition, and a nervous officialdom on that point were probably the most exasperating in his whole life. A friend of his was describing to me a little while ago an evening when the Prince was dining with the Guards during the retreat from Mons. All through the dinner the telephone was ringing, first for this officer and then for that, and each as he received his happy summons to the front, made his excuses and went gladly off. But no one rang for the Prince. Aching to serve and prove himself, he seemed almost the only officer present whom the War Office did not want. With each fresh goodbye his loneliness, his depression, his apparent uselessness became more marked.

At last he could contain himself no longer. With tears in his eyes and a choking voice, he burst forth, "I can't stand it, I can't stand it.
They must let me go." And at last they did.

I will not say that the last three and a half years have been the making of the prince. In the fundamentals of character, in all that really matters, he was made already. I mean that long before the war began he had given proof of the qualities that every parent looks and hopes for in his son and his son's friends—truthfulness, generosity, stability and instinctive uprightness, and simplicity of mind and nature. But what the war has done for him is to turn a boy into a man. It has brought him experiences otherwise unimaginable. It has thrown him in intimate contact with all sorts and conditions of men. He has seen life, and he has seen death, in the roar and at close range. Not since the days of the Black Prince has any heir to the British throne had such a schooling.

Those who know him best tell me that the chief change wrought in him by the war is an added confidence and self-reliance. And yet on one like myself, who has only recently met him, the first impression he makes is that of being young, for his years.
A last trace of his boyhood shows themselves in a certain diffidence of manner, a diffidence, however, delightfully

In keeping with his fresh young face, his frank gaze, and a total lack of any kind of affectation. The prince will be none the worse for maturing late.
He has, I should judge, an observant mind and his father's habit of thinking for himself, and if he learns life slowly he will learn it all the more thoroughly.
