GRANDEATHER'S OLD FRIEND.

A single light was burning in M. Dinois' study when he entered it and saw the unwelcome guest sitting in M. Sown particular chair. The new comer rose and met the squire half, way across the floor, greeting him with a finished courtesy which excelled that of M. Dunois himself in bus most dignified moments. The stranger was a tall man, of military bearing, with a remarkable head set well back on his powerful shoulders it is brow and jaw were heavy, his yes cold, his mouth quite concealed by a thick, sweeping, almost colorless moustache. His hair had originally been fair in hue, and had now that peculiar sheen caught by light hair changing to silver. His skin was of the same buff tint, and his head and face would have had the look of being and sleeping; but it was associated a gravened by a cover of new rout of one material but for the shim, fallen, chilled the old man to the bone as he sat listening to the distant music from the ball-room, rising and falling at the doors opened and closed in passages around and above him. The French stranger with the military name did not burry or disturb him as he sat motionless, still reflecting. Gone were the hopes that he had cast off his evil, which prosperity had helped him to recognize as evil. Up stairs, in that sombre, wood-paneled room, which Margaret had artlessly described to him as having a 'penitential' look, which troubled her young imagination, M. Dunois had since then spent long nights of thinking, and in the depths of the darkness and the gray of the dawn, the presence of that strange, brown man, lost in an agony of prayer—the figure that had caught his eye on the first moment of entering the room, had come to remember dimly that he possessed a soul; sometimes even to fancy that he had a wish for the favor of heaven.
