tangled weeds which choke the rose till it grows gaunt and thin and me of the paths of man which are beset with sin.

bloomed some lovely things for me to pay me for my toil.
ried every stone away and broke the stubborn soil, rded them from heat and drought and learned this truth anew—t all rewards are measured out by what a man will do.

low my garden's brown and bare and all my vines are dead,
I have known the loveliness of oses white and red, I have owned a Summer rich with fragrance and delight, Winter, be it cold and drear, is but the garden's night.

hin the walls where I have dwelt sweet joys have come and flown they were glorious Summer years that once were mine to own, what if now the Winter-time of sorrow brings its pain sorrow brings its pain, e day another Spring shall come and I shall smile again.

Will Address Bible Class

The programme committee of corge Street Bible Class has secured aptain A. Kean to address the class on "A Trip Abroad" at to-morrow afternoon's session. Captain Kean has lately returned from a visit to Italy, where he visited many interesting points. His wide experience coupled with his accepted ability to impart to others the impressions that he himself has received, makes it safe to say that those who hear his address morrow will listen to something really worth while.

Impossible to Fly Backwards.

No bird can fly for any appreciable stance tail first. The nearest apoach to such a movement is shown in the tumbler pigeon, when that bird slews his wings forward, and, suddenly turning back his head, throws a somersault, but this is not true backward flight. When a bird wishes to reverse his motion, it tilts its body laterally, as a railway carriage would be tilted in taking a curve, or increases the number of beats given by one wing as compared with the other, or keeps one wing extended whilst the other is partially flexed. But a bird can no more fly backwards than a ship can sail astern. Some birds, however, and particularly the albatross, can fly half upside down-that is, with the wings pointed in a direction nearly perpendicular to the sea, and when turning quickly in this position the appearance is sometimes almost as though the bird was using its wings in a backward direction, though their structure is not really adapted to any such movement; and when poised, facing a strong wind, birds may seem to move astern.
