Jeannie Sinclair.

THE LILY OF THE STRATH.

CHAPTER IV.

and thoughts and emotions too keen to be repressed rushed up in his bosom till they made it heave and sob.

Hastily he set down the light, leant his face a gainst the wall, and burst into tears.

The girl gazed at him in silent surprise, and became greatly moved at sight of his grief. And in truth it was a wondrous spectacle to behold that huge, uncouth man, rugged in appearance as a granite rock, giving way to an emotion so vehement.

It lasted only for a minute, for, with a sudden gesture, he dashed the tears from his eyes, and turned towards her.

It was wrang in me tae be sae overcome, but the sicht o' you and the bonny wean brought tae my mind the last sicht I had o' my ain wife and bairn. Ye maunas think I was aye the rough tyke I am now. I hae been a wanderer for mony a year; but ance, my lassie, I was as sttled and industrious a lad as ever had love and hope tae mak' him sing blythely at his daily toil. Then, oh! then, I had mae thouchts but o' hame and the happy loys I had then in the young wife that made it a' sunshine wi' her guidness and her love for me. Alack! alack! the happiness vanished like a snowflake in the Mae, and left me desolate and broken-hearted. Ae mornin' I gaed oot tae my wark as usual, leaving her lying in the bed, and oor bit bairnie sleepin' in her bosom, just as yours is at this momen. Waes me, I never never saw them mair. We lived away east, no far frae the sea. The French war was at the hettest then, and the pressgang was oot in search o' men tae fill the King's ships. I fell into their hands. They wadna aloo me even tae gang and bid farewell tae my wife, but carried me on board their ship, and in twa days I was in the forecastle o' aman o' war, bound for the fleet. For twa years I sailed here and there, never within sight o' the shores o' Scotland, and never able tae send word to my puir Peggy, or hear a scrap o' news aboot her. But the war cam' tee an end, and I was after tae return. As fast ast spossible I went hame tu' o' happiness and anticipated Joy, expecting 'tae clasp meet me. Oh, God, strangers lived in the heose I had left, and Peggy was lyin' in the auld kirkyard, wi' the bonny bairn aside her.'

'Alas, alas! that was a heavy shock for you,' murmured the gip!'.

'Frac that day I became a restless wanderer,' he continued, in a broken voice, 'and a wanderer!' Il remain till the end o' my days.'

'Poor unhappy Ned, how I feel for you.'

'Na, lassie, 'M no unhappy. In fact nac-body is happier than me. I like my wanderin life, and wadne schange its freedom for a' the luxuries o' the king's palace. Everybody is kind tae me. I get a blythe welcome and a bite and a sup wherever I gang, and a barn or a hayloft tae lay me doon in at nicht. Believe me, my lassie, nacbody is mair canty or crouse than wanderin' Ned. The times are rare when the memory o' the past comes owre me like this, and the greet I hae had will dae me guid. But I'm wrang again tae claver here, ancy our insic a weak state. I couldna rest till I kenned that the warst was passed wi' ye; and as I'll be wanderin' far frae here the morn, I thocht I would ca' on my way past tae Maister Ronaldson's strae barn, where I am tae get a sleep. When I come tae Sinclairtown again I hope tae find you strong and weel.'

'Alas, Ned, I feel that you will never see me again,' said the girl, her voice becoming lower and lower.

'Ye'll be gane, wull ye?' rejoined Ned, supposing she meant to indicate her departure to another part of the country.

'I will; and what, ob, what is to become of my child?'

'Hons, it's no that ye mean?' said Ned hopefully. 'Dinna tak' sip a fancy into yer heid. The wakeness ye feel is only for a time. In a day or twa strength will begin tae come, and hope and joy wi't.'

'Not one friend in the wide world, she wainingly answered. 'You have been kinder to me to than any one. I am a poor, lost, abandoned creature, an orphan without relatives and without a home.'

'Dinna speak ony mair o' this at present, said Ned, in a tone of kind commiseration.'

Yo ma cont me impident, but may I venture tae ask if ye hae nae f
