CHAPTER XXXIV.

AMERICAN IMPORTANY CONVERSATION OVERHEARD—EXCITING SCENE AT THE BAKK.

'I'm safe,' he muttered. 'I may count
Cloverlea mine, and to-morrow afternoon
'I'll go up and take possession. I haven't been saked to the grand wedding that all the Strath is going to, but I will have something as pleasant on hand, and a long sight more prolitable. Oatler, my horse.'

'Dinner is in, sir. They are just sitting down to it, 'said the landlord, who stood in the doorway.

down to is, asir. They are just sitting down to is, asid the landlord, who stood in the doorway.

'Don't want dinner to-day, Jobson. I'm in a great hurry. I must be home early.' And with a wave of the hand, McQuirk passed round to the stable yad to receive his horse from the hands of the ostler.

'You auld stingy buffer,' muttered the landlord. If everybody was like you on market day, my has would get purity on.' Notwithstanding his inward disgust, mine host managed to lock quite pleasant when the factor came riding out under the archway, and gave him a parting out as he moved away down the street.

Just at that moment the roll of wheels was heard, a horn was blown, and the couch from the south, laden with travellers, came fratiling round the corner, and entering the market place, pulled up at the unn door.

Down the south, laden with travellers, came fratiling round from the interior, and hastened with alsectly into the parlor to eat the dinner which had been prepared for them, while the holess were being changed—the more experienced among them knowing that the time gived among them knowing that the time gived among them knowing that the sanything like the worth of their half-crown, they would require to be sharp in their action.

but two of them, we shall let the rest pass, and direct particular attention to the couple we have indicated.

One of the two was a shabbily dressed individual, with an air not for a moment to be mistaken for that of a gentleman. His face had what might be called a knowing cast, got only through a carser of questionable character, as if he and the world in its leg respectable phase had been long acquainted.

The other was a short, stout, middle-aged man, very sunburned, and ruddy as if from constant exposure to the weather. His dress and appearance gave sufficient token that he was a sailor, probably a sea-captain.

In two minutes or less the announcement was made that time was up, and the coach would start that minute. Whereupon, amid many indignant exclamations, a rush was made for the street and the room was almost immediately cleared of all but the two men we have alluded to, who continued to con runne the viands on their plates with steady determination.

Presently, the landlord's rubicuod face.

Presently, the landlord's rubicuad face ooked in at the open door.

'Is you gentlemen gaun wi' the coach?' he onlyined.

'No,' answered the showily-dressed indi his mouth full.

'Haste ye, then, sir, or ye'll lose yer seat.'
'Nonsense, sir. I haven't had my dinner yet. The coach daren't start till I have had my dinner.'
But it wull start, sir. It canna stay a moment ahini its time.'
'That's humbug. I was told it would wait here for the passengers to dine, and I'm not going to rise half-fed.'
'Very weel, sir. ye canna blame me if ye.

That's humbug. I was told it would wait here for the passengers to dine, and I'm ot going to ruse half-fed.

Yery weel, sir; ye canns blame me if ye are left in the lurch.

No fear of my blaming anybody, for I won't be left in the—

'There; I tell't ye, sir, shouted the land-lord. 'The coach is awa.'

The sea captain—for we have rightly divined his profession and standing—dropped his knife and fork, and sat staring at the same time to the retreating sound of the coach wheels. The landlord stood staring at him in turn, till the belated traveller rush-ed to the open window and thrust out his bead and shoulders just in time to see the coach dash round the m, how durst they do a thing like this! he roared. 'Harkee, landlord, yold was yet was found to see the coach dash round the m, how durst they do a thing like this! he roared. 'Harkee, landlord, yold was yet was found to see the coach dash round the m, how durst they do a thing like this! he roared. 'Harkee, landlord, yold was yet was yet air faut, 'remarked the innikeeper.

'My fault, Boniface? How dare you stand there and say it was my fault—answer me that, Boniface?

'Bonny-face!' echoed mine host, reddening like a peony. 'I dinna like nic-names, it.' what infermal stupidity.' Iroared the iras 'Bonny-face!' echoed mine host, reddening like a peony. 'I dinna like nic-names, it.' what infermal stupidity.' Iroared the iras 'Roanian', 'Don't you know that Roniface is 'Captain', 'Don't you know that Roni air. As to my face, it may be bonny or no. I canna tell; but its just as my Maker made it."

What infernal stupidity, 'Iroared the ira' e Captain. 'Don't you know that Boniface is another name for innkeeper?'

'No I didna. Oh, very weel, if that's a', sace be it. But I wull say that this is a' your faut, sir, for I came and warned ye that the coach was gaunna start, and ye wadna heed me. I tak' this gentleman here to witness if I didna.'

'Uuquestionably you called him,' said the person appealed to.

'Yes, when I had'nt well begun my dinner. I was told the coach stopped till dinner was had, and how can a man be expected to swallow a plotting hot dinner like this in the dog days in ten minutes? On board ship, sir, we take two hours.'

'Twa hoors! Lord help us, sir. Did you think the coach wad stop here for twa hors?'

'Well, not exactly, but I expected half-anhour at the least. And here I am left here like a ship in a calm. Lost the breeze, by Jove, and must stay here where I am till another tide. Well, confound it; since it is another tide. Well, confound it; since it is another tide. Well, confound it; since it is not the myself confortable at anyrate.—Bring me a bottle of wine, and I'll have my after-dinn's mooze in that old hulk of a chair. Nothing like making your berth sing when you are in it.

Lodge, and it is likely to be strong in numbers before next year.

There are forty Swedish emigrants at Point Levi brought out by Canadian steamers. They are unable to leave, and are on the point of starvation. The Swedish Consul applied at the Emigration office to send them on or get the Steamship Company to do so, but the department could do nothing. He says that foreign vessels bringing puper emigrants were compelled to forward them and why rob the company?
