

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

THIS WORK WAS COMMISSIONED BY THE EUROPEAN BRANCH (REU) of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. We would like to thank Ross Miller and Peter van Brakel of REU for their support and encouragement throughout the project. We are grateful to François Boutin-Dufresne and Omar Zakhilwal for research assistance. We would also like to thank John Curtis, Mokhtar Souissi, and members of an interdepartmental government steering committee for many helpful and stimulating comments, as well as Brian Morrissey who provided encouragement and support throughout the project. Finally, we thank Véronique Dewez for proofreading both the English and French language versions of the text, and we offer a special thanks to Marie-Claude Faubert and Jean-Pierre Toupin for having page set and translated this study. Any remaining errors are entirely our own.

This study was prepared for the review of the interdepartmental steering committee on December 14, 2000. Revisions in light of discussions during the review and written comments received afterwards were made over February and March, 2001. All data were finalized as of February 23, 2001.

The views expressed in this paper do not necessarily reflect those of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade or of the federal government.
