

in that they stood alone together in the soft twilight and the cloistral quiet.

"I feel for you, more than I can or dare express," he said, "and I am sure that reason alone would have had such a necessity laid upon you, and to have seen the result with your own eyes. It is vain to repeat that I would have done anything—anything whatsoever—only to have disappointed both parties; it was the work of fate."

"No," she interposed, "it was the mercy of God that sent me there and placed the duty before me, and I am glad that reason have I for regret! None; believe me, none. If I shudder at the memory of what I have seen, I am nevertheless very grateful—grateful beyond measure—to have been able to do what I did."

He longed to take and kiss her hand again, as she said those words with the most earnest emphasis; but never could he least have dared anything that savored in the remotest degree of presumption. His obligation overpowered him, but she revealed to him (with unconscious reliance upon his sympathy which touched him to the heart) all the depths of her feelings. It was as if he had entered a sanctuary, where the very atmosphere rebuked anything that inclined to selfish passion.

"Yes, you have saved my life," he said. "And I beg you never to forget that I am so glad that I know I shall always be glad to dwell. Life given to me through your hands seems to have a greater value than ever before, as a gift is cherished according to our feeling for the giver. God knows, if you had any use for it, even the least. There is no service I could render you that I would not perform, at any cost. I know this as I know that I exist; yet how idle the thought of giving it to you! For your life is so full to overflowing of every good gift of fortune,—may I say, every good gift of God; for fortune is blind, but God, seeing how worthy you are of these gifts, gives them to you. I have such a bundle of measure that I can do. It seems hard to owe so much and to be able to give nothing; yet there is a sweetness even in that. I cannot give, the more I desire. I have seen from one so gentle, so noble, so worthy of a man's best homage, as yourself."

He had no idea how his voice was betraying him in the teacher's twilight that threw its soft veil over the scene. He felt as if he saw away where they stood. At the last sentence he stopped himself abruptly, and substituted other words for the passionate ones that trembled upon his tongue; but, as his voice fell, there was a mingling of the tones of the heart that vibrated with the deep thrill of a feeling in his tones.

Zarifa, standing motionless in her clinging black draperies, with her statue-like face and her eyes of—glad for a moment to have seen a moment what she should do. But it was only for a moment. She had felt the next instant how entirely unconscious was his betrayal; and the strong self-restraint which was evident in his last words came back to her deeply. She had to pause for a moment to imitate that self-restraint before she could answer. Then she said, with something wistful in the sweet music of her tones,—

"It is a little wrong. No life can be so prosperous, so well filled with the good gifts of God, that there is no room in it for the kindness of a friend. I have been able to save your life. That is true. But it was an accident. Some day these things will be able to do it. I will outweigh it as much as an act of deliberate intention outweighs an act of impulse. And if not,—if the opportunity is not given to you, for one does not make these things possible to do,—I will do it. At least that you have the will to serve me; and that is enough."

"Surely," he said, moved almost beyond his power of self-control, yet quieted too, by those exquisitely gentle words, "you must give me the best of all that belongs to you; you may never have any use for it,—that is most likely,—but nevertheless if at any time you summoned me, though it were from the end of the world, to do your bidding, believe me, I should come."

"I do believe it," she said, thrilled by the passion of his tone. "But let us say no more of this. All is understood, if not expressed. I, too, have a great obligation to you. And now I must go and find how it is with that poor creature in the hospital."

He could not utter another word but he walked by her side across the court in the lovely twilight stillness, and he felt that Zarifa was his friend. He felt that she belonged to him, and Zarifa looked into his pale, moved face with a startled entreaty in her eyes.

"He has made his confession," said the priest, and he has promised to do as the Order requires. His attempts on Senor Derwent's life to the proper officials. They are taking his testimony now, and it exonerates Senor Barrera entirely. But he is sinking fast."

"Ah, my God!" said Zarifa, putting her hand to her heart.

"My child, be not gravely," "stop and think what a good thing such an end as this is for him. What is the natural life, when it is spent in forgetfulness of God and stained so deeply with crime that death is a relief? He would have been might send the soul into perdition? When such a life as that ends, by the mercy of God, with contrition, and with repentance, is it not something for which to be devoutly thankful? It is a good thing that by the higher light,—the light of God's eternal purposes. Your promptness and your courage saved a life."

but, believe me,—and I speak, who have the depths of this poor soul, —you should be far more grateful that your bullet has saved a soul. Never might I have been so glad to come to him otherwise,—the grace that sends him forth to the bar of eternal justice contrite, absolved, and fortified by the sacraments. Come with me now. I am going to the church for the Holy Eucharist.

I have made the foregoing changes for two reasons.

The first is because many people have abused the privilege of the business of publishing the paper, in my own interest and that of the longer continue to furnish the paper.

The second reason is, that I want city weeklies, which are made and, therefore, cost little for paper like the ADVANCE, the type for it.

Having published the ADVANCE to make it a creditable representative enterprise—a paper which may have fear that it has catered to sensational lines of matter, which is too often I have reason to hope the full general approval and be the means and influence of the paper.
