PERFECTLY SOBER.—An acquaintane of mine, a gentleman of festive disposition, is slightly given to being out late, and drinking deep. One night he came home to his wife in a decidedly elevated condition, much more so than any man should, especially when going into the presence of his wife. This he comprehended, and as it was rather late, and the house perfectly quiet, he conceived the idea of pulling off his boots in the hall, and going up to his wife's chamber so quietly as not to awaken her, in which case, provided he was successful, she would not suspect his condition. The light was turned down low, and his wife was apparently asleep. He began to undress, and by the greatest care he got along pretty well. At length he believed himself ready, and putting out the light,

He wakened his wife, and she spoke; "Is that you, John?" "Yes, love, coming to bed." "Are you sober to-night, John?" "Perfectly sober, my love." "You are, ch?" Well, John, hadn't you beiter take off your hat?"

he attempted to creep softly into bed.
