John Pitkin, who was the prison chaplain at the time, John Lee, the man whom the authorities tried three times unsuccessfully to hang, became a barman after his release from prison in 1907. Many people used to go to the public house where he was serving, just to be served by a released murderer! He added to his income by writing an account of his experiences after being released. His example has been followed by several released murderers. Everybody knows the famous pair of murderers Burke and Hare, who killed people for the sake of the amount which their bodies would fetch Burke was hanged and Hare released. Many and many a time afterwards he must have wished that he had been fortunate enough to be hanged. After his release he obtained work under a false name at a lime burner's. By some means his true identity be came known to his fellow-workers, who promptly set upon him and threw him into one of the kilns. He was rescued in time to preserve his wretched life, but the lime had destroyed the sight of both of his. eyes. Eventually he wandered through London streets for many years as a blind beggar, and eventually died in the utmost poverty and misery. Most readers will remember the famous Penge mystery in which the Stautons were tried and condemned to death for starving to death Mrs. Louis Stauton. One of the Stautons died in prison not long after his conviction, but his wife, who had been condemned with him, lived to make a successful living. Louis Stauton himself, after his release, married again, was given £100 by the Counsel who defended him, and started in a prosperous business, trying to forget the terrible times he had been through.

Most released murderers, in fact, promptly change their names and do all within their power to retrieve the past, and make up for their lost years in prison
