A COLLECTION WHICH THROWS LIGHT ON B The tru tees of the British Museum have just acquired a most important collection of Oriental manuscripts, consisting of 138 volumes, more or less fragmentary. They contain Arabic commentaries of the Biole, with the Hebrew text written by Karatie Jewas literage and bymas, both of the Karatie polemical treatises, and grammatical, lexicographical and philosophical treatises. Among the commentaries with the Hebrew text are some of the high est importance, ranking among the old est Arabic manuscripts, some of the sour maidens powdered their half with gold.

They date back to A. D. 393, A.D. 1005, A.D. 1005, A.D. 1005. These early manuscripts are of the greatest interest for Biblical students in showing the cause of the high down in the Tall mud, 'that the sacred Scriptures must not be written in any other than the square Hebrew characters,' and demons first for the first time that the Jews were in the habit of writing the Scriptures and strength other characters. square flebrew characters, and demonstrate for the first time that the Jews were in the habit of writing the Scriptures in other characters. Another point of extreme interest, which they confirm, is the fact that though the commentaries were written in Arabic they contain large quotations from Anan's commentaries in Aramaic, thus proving beyond doubt that Anan, the founder of the Karaites, wrote in Aramic, the language spoken in Palestine in the time of Christ. It is now claimed that the British Museum has the most valuable manuscripts of the Old Testament in existence. The Jewish Persian manuscripts have recently been added to the collection.
