

As part of this approach, the Advisory Group on Work Time and the Distribution of Work has been established. Reporting to the Minister for Human Resources Development, the group helps the government identify choices that could help Canadians balance their work and family life better, that could increase access to employment, and that could allow greater opportunities for education and training.

Taken together, these policies are boosting job growth now and will continue to do so over the long haul.