

The ravaged fields, waste, colourless, and bleak, Retreating Winter leaves, with angry frowns,
And lingering on the distant snow-streaked hills, Displays the motley remnants of his reign.

designs, by engaging Marie to listen to some pretended pious discourses, which he read to her in the most impassioned manner, not which he only used as a pretext to make a most warm and amorous declaration of his passion for her. Marie, though astonished by his vivacity and agitation, did not understand his object, but attributed the state of excitation he was in to the fervour of his piety. This circumstance was proved on the trial by a young man who had been listening outside the window to the mystical declarations of Mingrat. A few days after this, Marie went to St. Quentin, and entered the church about six o'clock in the evening. On seeing Mingrat, she saluted him respectfully, and said, she came to confess to him. He, on some pretext or other, got her into the Presbytery where he lived, adjoining the church. There, it appears, he consummated the double crime of violation and assassination, in doing which he must have gagged the mouth of his victim, as low, inarticulate, and stifled moans, were heard by his
