Scores of passengers were injured, several of the train crew were hurt. Two of the coaches were stove in. Had the coaches not been of steel construction the accident might have been more serious.

Reid asserts that he was unable to see the Ottawa train in time. A difference of only a few minutes separates the two trains on the time schedule, but on account of trouble with the steam hose, it is said that it stood eighteen minutes in front of the station. Reid says he had received the clear signal at Belleville and was not warned after the coach of any danger ahead.

Many of the passengers were hurled from their berths to the floor of the car. There was nothing in the nature of a panic, however. The men dressed hurriedly and rushed outside to lend what aid they could.

Among those who were most seriously hurt were: Frank Smith and F. Navin, both of Coburg. They are both car inspectors and were lying under the Ottawa train, repairing some steam hose which had burst, when the crash came.

Tires on the automobile which bore Mrs. Jackson to the church were cut by the crowd, threats and hisses sounded loudly, literature branding her as an impostor were passed about through the throng which filled every inch of the little church and overflowed to the porch, steps, windows and small roofs under the windows.
