

ANOTHER POLAR EXPEDITION.

Almost simultaneously with the reports that the Wellman polar expedition has been lost comes the announcement that another expedition has started out, this time from England. It goes on the steam bark Windward, under the leadership of a Mr. Jackson, and the following details of the course to be taken are given in the London Telegraph of a recent date:

Her plan of action is to sail in the first place to Franz Josef land, going as high as the ship possibly can up the coast, and then landing the party of eight resolute explorers. Franz Josef land lies well inside the circle of 80 degrees beyond Nova Zembla.

If Mr. Jackson, the leader of the expedition, and his seven brave companions, can effect a good start from any point on this shore, they hope, if not to reach the pole at any rate to go beyond, and even long beyond, the eighty-three degrees twenty minutes reached by Marcham and Nares, and 83 degrees 24 minutes of Lockwood in Greeley's voyage.

Mr. Leigh-Smith, who visited Franz Josef land in his yacht, found plenty of game and fish there, with polar bears and seals abundant. In what direction, however, the coasts of that frozen tract may stretch no one knows; north whether it may lead the explorers directly to the north or block their way cliffs.

After landing her party the Windward is to return home, returning to the Arctic seas in the summer of 1896. The distance from the point of landing to the pole itself may be reckoned at about 700 miles, and Mr. Jackson's party gives it self two years to accomplish this and the return. The Windward hopes to pick them up at the end of 24 months, or else to find tidings and instructions; but all beyond the frozen soil upon which the gallant band will disembark is unknown, uninhabited, and mysterious; and once they bid farewell to their stout ship, we shall lose sight and hearing of them almost as much as if they were travelling in the moon.

Nothing appears to have been forgotten which could conduce to render the Jackson-Hamsworth expedition a success. The Windward herself is a very strong, barque-rigged screw steamer of about 400 tons. She has been fortified so with inner "struts," timbers and partitions, and to be practically almost solid, and her bows are armed against the hard Arctic ice with tempered steel plates. Broad-beamed and massive in lines, she is yet a swift craft much distinguished as a "whaler," and sails of course as well as steams.

Her officers and crew number nineteen; but these, as we have said, will return. The few left who will part company from them on the icy brink of the polar basin are Mr. Jackson himself; Mr. Armitage, an officer of the Peninsular and Oriental Company; Dr. Kesteven, the medical man; Captain Schlosser, of the Mercantile marine; Mr. Fisher, curator of the Nottingham museum; Mr. Burgess, Mr. Childs and Mr. Dunford. All these gentlemen have been selected with the greatest care for special gifter nor has anything been neglected to sustain their courageous endeavors.

Provisions for four years, on full rations, packed in the most portable and concentrated form, all the hold of the Windward. For lighting, cooking, and warmth they take spirits 60 above proof, which will not freeze in any place except Professor Dewar's laboratory, and such stores as four thousand pounds of tinned meat, four and a half tons of flour, one ton of oatmeal, one ton of sugar, one thousand seven hundred and eighty pounds of pressed vegetables, tons of potatoes, hundreds of pounds of honey, chocolate, time juice, etc.

In the Arctic regions one must eat well to live. To carry these ample viands across the ice they have an assortment of light and strong sledges, averaging twenty pounds in weight, but equal to a load of a thousand pounds. These will be drawn for them by Siberian dogs, waiting for that duty at Archangel; and Siberian ponies are also to be employed. For the dogs alone five tons of cod-liver biscuits are taken, and for the ponies twelve tons of compressed hay. For shelter collapsible tents, without poles or ropes, are provided, with five light boats, one entirely of aluminum. As regards clothing and all other equipments, the experience of every Arctic journey has been drawn upon; and if these stores appear excessive in respect of carriage when we think of the rugged land and icy seas to be traversed, it must be borne in mind that the party will have to establish depots along the route which it follows towards the pole, and by which it will, if all goes well, probably return.

The Telegraph accompanies this description with a large amount of fusian talk about some Englishman being so ready to furnish funds for such an expedition and other Englishmen being so brave in volunteering to take part in it. Nobody has so far shown that there is anything to be gained by reaching the north pole further than the gratification of curiosity. Is this purpose such as to justify the sacrifice of life and treasure involved? It is hard to see that it is, while there are other ways in which English money and courage might be directed with the result of benefits being conferred on mankind.

Several other little matters were dealt with and the meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the past committee and secretaries.

The annual rifle tournament held at Goldstream was brought to a close on Saturday, when Lieut.-Col. Prior, in the presence of a number of the officers of the militia, presented the prizes won during the three days' meeting. He complimented the different prize winners, and in fact all the competitors, on the splendid scores made, the average being far ahead of last year. If the eight men making the highest aggregate scores are able to repeat their success at the coming year's meeting, the British Columbia team will be represented by a very strong team. It is feared that four out of the eight will be unable to go, in which case those following on the list will be chosen. Sergeant A. R. Langley, who heads the list, has been doing some excellent shooting. Lieut. J. D. Taylor is an old Ottawa man, who always can be relied on. Gunners H. C. Chamberlain, J. C. Chamberlain and J. C. Chamberlain have all had places on Wimbledon. The places on the Ottawa team will be awarded as follows:

1. Sgt. A. R. Langley..... 406
