On one occasion in backing up to a place on the river where the bank was very steep and high, and where the water was very deep below, the horses took a sud-den freak to back up with a rush, with the result that the cart went over the bank, dragging the horses after it down into the river below. Fortunately the rush was made so quickly that the horses did not become entangled in the harnesses, and after finding themselves beyond their depth in water turned and swam to the opposite bank, which hap-pened to be lower, so that they could get out unassisted. In order to prevent furt trouble, I kept quiet, but I had alre earned the animosity of the first m Before the end of the week things g worse than before—scolding and m vulgar words at me and the whole the watch. Flohr could not agree w the sailors, either; and the cook; mo over, earned the hatred of the f mate. Flohr now felt bitterly inc ed against the other sailors, but against Rau and myself. On the eving of the 2nd November the first m gripped me by the chest and flung to the ground. I told the captain whad happened, whereupon he s "Just leave that to me. I have s it." After this the food and water case fimited, and the food was be cooked. They complained to the c tain, "This is not food for a dog, m less for human beings." The first m at this time was tolerable at night; by night he was as if he were moses. at this time was tolerable at night; at this time was tolerable at night; by night he was as if he were posses of a devil. On the morning of the 1 November it came is a collision tween Flohr and the first mate. I first mate flung Flohr to the detwice. He came on to the bridge me, and said. "By and by it will your turn."
