Sir John said it required grave consideration to discover the reliability of the document just read by Cunningham, and as to what should be done with the man who approached him, as well as with a member who allowed himself to be so approached. (Clieers.) The document should be laid on the table, and would receive the most serious consideration of the House.

Holton moved that Ald. Henry be taken in charge by the Sergeant-ut-Arms, and in charge by the Sergeant-ut-Arms, and the motion was carried without debate.

McKay and Wright spoke carnestly in defence of the Ministers, and depreciating anything tending to inferfere with the construction of the Facile Rillway. This and Bothwell followed, but the noise made by members and spectators leaving the House to get away from the infection, drowned his voice for sometime. He argued the question financially morally politically and constitutionally, showing that the Government had been guilty, were guilty now, and always would be guilty of any charge which ever had been or might be brought against them. He said the submission of despatches by haffer in was done with the intendent of influencing the members of the House. Sir John rose to a point of order. He chaimed that Mills had no right to laptic motives to this fixcellency.

The following despatches were received Sir John believed that the Governor General had power to convey message to Parliament even against the advice of his Ministers. If this were not the case what mode had the Imperial Government of communicating with this House or any Colony if desirable. He argued the principle at some length, the Opposition as usual interrupting, that while he, Sir John, was a Minister he could never get leave to lay before Parliament any information the acting Governor General wished himato, even though the documents should be against himself. Referring to Queen Caroline's Trenty in 1820, when there was a storm of indignation at the exercise of the prerogative: and again in 1830, when the usher of the Black Rod came to announce the arrival of the Sovereign then Sir Robert Peel was making an indignant protest against it. He would not blame the Opposition that in the momentary disappointment on the 18th August, they had used strong terms. He maintained, at length, that there was a solemn compact that Parliament should be prorogued on the 18th August He represented Sir Hugh Allan as going to England in March last, to make financial arrangements for the Pacific Railroad, having a charter—every clause of which was founded on a law passed by Parliament.

Mr. Huntington made his charges on the 2nd of April, while these negotiations, so necessary and important, were going on. Mr. Huntington might had honorable motives, but the aim was not simply to attack the Government, but to destroy the charter, and upset all previous legislation on the subject.
