which challenged universal admiration, and which now intensifies the regret that he has lost it. Such a men, had he lived, must have made a good president.

But it is idle now to speak of what might have been. The part of wisdom is to take up the lessons of the tragedy and apply them. Of the wretched assassin the less said the better—he will be as easily disposed of as any other murderer. The spoils system is chiefly responsible for the crime, and bitter party feeling acting upon a weak-minded office-seeker supplied him with the motive of accomplishing it. The lamentable result is a terrible warning to the American people to reform the one and modify the state of the continually drawn on and diminished.
