are likely and added that in this century we had brincess of Wales who lived in the hearts of their future subjects." The truth of this will not be denied even by those who are disposed to pay little regard to the claims of royalty. It wassaid, soon after the catastrophe of Sedan and the troubles of the nmune, that, so popular was the prince of Wales in Paris particularly and in France generally, if he had put up for the presiency of the republic he would have been lected almost by acclamation. And so, it may be repeated, if ours were an elective nonarchy, no man in the country would have a chance for the crown against the candidature of the Prince of Wales. Numerous instances might be drawn from the public career of his royal highness to show how well grounded is this vast popu-larity; and an opportunity has just been afforded us to throw some light upon the opinions of the prince, as recently expressed in conversations abroad and at home. It is the fashion to ignore any po-litical inclinations in the royal family, and the custom has much to recommend it; but the custom has much to recommend it; but when princes are capable men they must have prepossessions, and there seems no reason why the statements offered us should be withheld. The earliest influences which his royal highness remembers were liberal, though perhaps not very definite in their ten-dency. As a young man he was much at pernaps not very definite in their ten-dency. As a young man he was much at-tracted by Lord Palmerston's policy and personality. He was not, at that stage, very greatly drawn to Earl Russell or Mr. Gladstone, for whose honority and much very greatly drawn to Earl Russell or Mr. Gladstone, for whose honesty and public spirit he, however, has acquired a marked admiration. He has a great regard for many points in the character of the late Lord Derby, but he was never sympathetic with Lord Beaconsfield, though he was largely fascinated by that very remarkable man. The constant growth of the empire inspires no belief in a policy of effacement, and the prince has no desire to shirk, where neces-sary, from the assertion and even the exten-tion of imperial responsibilities. On this sary, from the assertion and even the exten-tion of imperial responsibilities. On this account he is rather drawn to the radicals who have broken away from the traditions of the Manchester peace party; but with the number of attached personal friends he has among foreign princes and politicians, it would be singular indeed if he cared to
