

in whose freedom from the corrupting influences which affect ourselves we can absolutely rely.

Certainly if anything could justify the present appointment of a judicial commission the state of things existing, as shown by recent disclosures, would do so, but if the disease is to be cured some more potent remedy than the appointment of a commission must be found. The commissioners may fix the guilt upon the proper shoulders, and show how far the responsibility for it extends, but unless the public at large, irrespective of party, exert their proper influence, resolved that in future party interests shall not be an excuse for wrong-doing, the judges may just as well be allowed to confine themselves to their proper duties, and avoid the risk of being mixed up in party conflicts. The people have the remedy in their own hands and should use it, and not fall into the easy habit of calling upon judges, or any other functionaries, to get them out of the troubles which are entirely due to their own indifference, and, too often, to their connivance.

PRACTICE — PARTICULARS — DISCOVERY — INSPECTION PRIVILEGE — RULE 203 (ONT. RULE 299) — RULE 358 (ONT. RULE 460).

Milbank v. Milbank (1900) 1 Ch. 376, is a case which exemplifies the fact that documents which may be privileged from production for the purpose of discovery may, nevertheless, be subject to the provisions of Rule 203 (Ont. Rule 299), so that the party in whose possession they are may be bound to give particulars thereof to the opposite party. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that she was entitled (subject to incumbrances) to an estate in fee simple in the lands in question in the action of which the defendant was in possession, and claimed by his defence to be in as owner under a sale made by mortgagees under a power of sale in their mortgage, and that he had purchased in good faith without notice of the plaintiff's title, and he relied on his title as such bona fide
