look, his head was round and closely CHAPTER I

"Where does Bersardet live?"
"At the passage to the right. Yea, that house which you see with the grating and the garden behind is."

The man to whom a passerby had given this information havried away in the direction pointed out. Although gasping for breath, he twied to run, in order to more quickly reach the little house at the end of the passage of the Elysce des Beaux Arts. This passage, a sort of oul de sac, on either side of which were black buildings, strange old houses and dilapidated storehouses, opened upon a bonlevard filled with life and movement, with people promaading, with the noise of transways, with gaysty and the noise of tramways, with gayety and tight.

The man wore the dress and had the tearing of a workman. He was very thort, very fat, and his bald head was bared to the warm October rain. He was a workman, in truth, who worked in his concerege lodge, making over and mending garments for his neighbors, while his wife looked after the house, tweet the staircases and complained of her lot.

Mme. Moniehe found life hard and disagreeable and regretted that it had throat.

Mme. Moniche found life hard and disagreeable and regretted that it had not given her what it promised when, at 18, and vary pretty, she had expected something better than to watch beside a sailor bent over his work in a concierge's lodge. Into her life a tragedy had sud-lenly, precipitated itself, and Mme. Monich's found that day something to brighten up her aftences. Entering a moment before the apartment occupied by M. Rovere, she had found her lodger lying on his back, his eyes fixed, his trues flung out, with a gash across his throat.

M. Rovere had lived alone in the house for many years, receiving a few mysterious persons. Mms. Moniche looked after his apartment, entering by sing her own key whenever it was secessary, and her lodger had given her permission to come there at any time to read the daily papers.

Mms. Moniche hurried down the stairs.

stairs. "M. Rovers is dead! M. Rovers has been murdered! His threat has been but! He has been assaminated!" And pursuing her husband out of the door-the exclaimed:

the exclaimed:
"The police—go for the police!"
This word "police" awakened in the inilor's mind not the thought of the neighboring e-amissary, but the thought of the man to whom he full that he ought to appeal, whom he cought to appeal, whom he good little M. Bernardat, who passed for a man of genins of his kind at the Eurete and for whom Mennishs had clean required coats

M. Bernardet, who passed for a man of penius of his hind at the Surete and for whom Moniebe had often repaired coats and rehemmed trousers.

From the mansien in the Boulevard is Clichy, where Moniebe lived, to M. Bernardet's house was but a short distance, and the eneriesge knew the way very well, as he had often been there, but the poor man was so stupfied, so overwhelmed, by the sudden appearance of his wife in his room, by the brutal revelation which same to him as the blow of a first by the howrible manner of M. Rovere's death, that he lost his head. Horrified, breathless, he asked the first passerby where Bernardet lived, and he ran as fast as he could in the direction pointed out.

ran as fast as he could in the direction pointed out.

Arrived at the grating, the worthy man, a little confused, stopped short. He was very strongly moved. It seemed to him that he had been east into the agony of a horrible nightmare. An assassination in the house! A murder in the Boulevard de Clichy in broad daylight, just over his head, while he was quietly repairing a vest!

He stood looking at the house without ringing. M. Bernardet was, no doubt, breakfasting with his family, for it was Sunday, and the police officer, meeting Moniche the evening before, had said to him, "Tomorrow is my birthday."

breakfasting with his family, for it was Sunday, and the police officer, meeting Moniche the evening before, had said to him, "Tomorrow is my birthday."

Moniche bestixted a moment. Then he rang the bell. He was not kept waiting. The sudden opening of the grating startled him. He pushed back the door and entered. He crossed a little court, at the end of which was a parilion. He mounted the three steps and was met on the threshold by a little woman, as roy and fresh as an apple, who, napkin in hand, gayly saluted him.

"Eh, M. Meniche!"

It was Mma. Bernardet, a Burgundian woman, about 35 years of age, trim and coquettish, who stepped back so that the tailor could enter.

"What is the matter, M. Moniche?"

Poor Moniche rolled his frightened syes around and gasped out, "I must speak to M. Bernardet."

"Nothing assier," said the little woman. "M. Bernardet is in the garden. Yes, he is taking advantage of the boautiful day. He is taking a group?—

"What group?"

"You know very well photography is his passion. Come with me."

And Mme. Bernardet pointed to the end of the corridor, where an c.pen doer gave a glimpse of the garden at the rear of the house. M. Bernardet to the end of the corridor, where an c.pen doer gave a glimpse of the garden at the rear of the house. M. Bernardet, the in spector, had posed his three daughters with their mether about a small table, on which coffee had been served.

"I had just gone in to get my napkin, when I heard you ring." Mme. Bernardet said.

Bernardet made a sign to Moniche not to advance. He was as plump and as gay as h's wife. His mustache was red, his devulle chin smooth shaven and rosy, his eyes had a sharp, cunning

2 4

.

ASS

CHAPTER II.

Bernardet was quite an original character. Among the agents, some of whom were very odd, and among the devoted subalterns this little man, with his singular mind, with his insatiable curricity, reading anything he could lay his hands on, passed for a literary person. His chief sometimes laughingly said to him:

"Bernardet, take care. You have literary ambitions. You will begin to dream of writing for the papers."

"Ch, no, M. Morell But what would, you? I am simply amusing myself."

This was true. Bernardet was a born hunter. With a superior education lie might have become a savant, a frequenter of libraries, passing his life in working on documents and in deciphering manuscripts. The son of a dairyman, brought up in a Lancastrial school, reading with avidity all the daily papers, astracted by everything mysterious which happened in Paris, having associaplished his military duty, he applied for admission to the police bureau, as he would have embarked for the sew world, for Mexico or for Tosquin, is order to travel in a new country. Then he married, so that he might have in his checkered existence, which was dancerous and wearying, a haven of rest, a preside of peaceful joy.

So he lived a double life, tracking malefactors like a bloedhound and cultivating his little garden. There he devoured old books for which he had paid a few sous at some book stall. He read and pasted in old old leaves, rebound them himself and out clippings from papers. He filled his round, bald head with a mass of facts which he investigated, classified, put into their proper place, to be brought forth as occasion a manded.

He was an inquisitive person—a very lock, his head was round and closely gropped.

The three daughters, clothed alike in Sectch pixid, were posting in front of a photographic apparatus which stood on a tripod. The eldest was about 12 years of ags, the youngest a child of 5. They were all three strangely alike.

M. Bernardet, in honor of his birthday, was taking a picture of his daughters. The ferget who from morning till night tracked robbers and malefactors into their hiling places was taking his recreation in bis damp garden. The sweet idyl of this hidden life repaid him for his unceasing investigations, for his trouble and fatiguing man huntsthrough Paris.

"There," he said, clapping the capover the lean. "That is all. Go and play now, my dears. I am at your service now, Moniche."

He shut up his photograph apparatus, pulling out the tripod from the deep soil in which it was imbedded, while his daughters joyonly ran to their mother. The young girls stood gasing at Moniche, "if their great hune eyes, pieroing and clear. Bernardet turned to look at him- and at once divined that something had happened.

"You are as white as your handkerchief, Moniche," he said. "A murder?"

"A murder, yes, M. Bernardet. M. Rovere—you did not know ham?"

"No."

"He was an original, a recluse, and now he hay been assassinated. My wife went to his room to read the papers"—Bernardet interrapted him brusquely: "When did it happen."

"Ah, dame, monsieur, I do not know! All I know is my wife found the body still warm. She was not afraid. She touched it."

"Beill warm!"

These words struck Bernardet. He reflected a moment. Then he said: "Come, left us go to your house." He was an inquisitive person-He was an inquisitive person—a very inquisitive person indeed. Currisity filled his life. He performed with pleasure the most fatiguing and requisive tasks that fall to a police officer's lot. They estimated the original need of his nature and permitted him to spe everything, to hear everything, to panetrate has the most curious mysteries—today, in dress suit with white tie, carelessly absecting over the crowds at the opera to and or dress suit with write the carelessly glancing over the opends at the opera to discover the thieves who took opera glasses, which they sent to accomplices in Germany to be sold; tomorrow go-ing in ragged clothes to arrest a mur-derer in some cutthroat den in the Gla-ciers.

decrease of the most powerful bankers, seized their books and made them go away with him in a cab. He had followed their books and made them go away with him in a cab. He had followed the intrigues of more select their books and made device select their books and made deviced, by order, the intrigues of more than one fine lady, who owed to him her salvation. What if M. Bernardet had thought fit to speak? But he never apoke, and reporters came out worsted from any attempt at an interview with him. "An interview is silver, but silence is gold," he was wont to say, for he was not a fool.

He had sesist! I at spirifual scances and attended secret meetings of anarchists. He had occupied himself with occult matters, consulting the magicians of chance, and he had at his tongoe's end the list of conspirators. He knew the true names of the famous Greeks who shuffled cards as one scouts about under an assumed name. The gambling hells were all familiar to him. He knew the churches in whose dark corners areactates assembled to talk of affairs, who did not wish to be seen in beer shops or spied upon in cabarets. "Dtill warm!"
These words struck Bernardet. He reflected a moment. Then he said:
"Come, let us go to your house."
Then, struck with a sudden idea, he added, "Yes, I will take it."

corners associates assembled to talk of affairs, who did not wish to be seen in beer shops or spied upon in cabareta.

Of the millions in Faris he knew the secrots of this whirlpool of humanity. Oh, if he had ever become prefect of police, he would have studied his Paris, mot at a distance, looking up statistics in books, or from the windows of a police hursau, but in the streets, in wretched ledgings, in hovels, in the asylums of misery and of crime. But Farnardet was not ambitions Life smited him very well as he found it, His good wife had brought to him a small dower, and Bernardet, contran with this poor little fortuns, found that he had all the power he wanted—the power, when occasion demanded, of putting his hand on the shoulder of a former minister and of taking a murderer by the throat.

One day a financier, threatened with imprisonment in Mazas, pleated him very much. Bernardet entered his office to arrest him. He did not wish to have a 19w in the bank. The police officer and banker found themselves alone, face to face, in a very small room, a private office, with heavy curtains and a thick carpet, which stified all noise.

"M. le Comte jests."

"A hundred thousand!"

"The pleasantry is very great, but it is a pleasautry."

"Thun the count, very pais, said. Then, struck with a sudden idea, he added, "Yes, I will take it."

He unfastoned his camera from the tripod. "I have three plates left which I can use," he said.

Mme. Bernardet, who was standing at a little distance, with the children clinging to her skirts, perceived that the concierge had brought important news. Bernardet's smiling face had suddenly changed. The expression became serious, his glames fixed and keen.

"Art thou going with him?" Mme. Bernardet saked as she saw her husband buckle on a leather bandolier.

"Yes," he answered.

"Ah, mon Divi! My poor Sunday, and this evening! Can we not go to the little theater at Montmartre this evening."

ing?"
"I do not know," he replied.
"You promised. The poor children!
You promised to take them to see Clo-

You promised to take them to see Clo-serie des Genets."
"I cannot tell. I do not know. I will see," the little man said. "My dear

"You are as white as your had Moniche," he said.

"The pleasantry is very great, but it is a pleasantry."

Then the count, very pale, said,
"And what if I crack your head?"
"My brother editers are waiting for me," Bernardet signly replied. "They know that our interview does not promise to be a long one, and this last proposition, which I wish so forget like the others, would only aggravate. I believe, if it became known, M. le Comte scase."

Two minutes as a ward the banker went out, preceding Bernardet, who followed him with hard head. The banker said to his employees, in an easy tone. "Goodby for the moment, mesme: "Goodby for the moment, mes It was also Bernardet who, visiting the Bank Hauts-Plateaux, selfd to his chief, "M. Morel, something very seri-ous is taking place there." "What is it, Bernardet?" "I do not know, but there is a meet-ing of the bank directors, and today I ing of the bank direc Moniche, today is my fortieth birthday. I promised to take them to the theater, but I must go with you." Turning to his wife, he added: "But I will come back as soon as I can. Come, Moniche, let us hasten to your M. Rovers."

He kissed his wife on the forehead and each little girl on both cheeks, and, strapping the camera in the bandoler, he wens out, followed by the tailor. As they walked quickly along Moniche kept repeating. "Still warm—yes, M. Bernardet, still warm." saw two servants carry a man in there in an invalid's chair. It was the Earon de Cheylard."
"Well⁵"

in an invalid's chair. It was the Earch de Cheylard."

"Baron Cheylard, in his quality of ex-senator of the second empire, of expressioner of the second empire, of expressioner of industrial expositions, is grand cross of the Legion of Honor. Grand cross—that is to say, that he cannot be pursued only after a decision of the council of the order. And then, you understand—if the Earch of Hauts-Plateaux demands the presence of its vice president, the Earon of Cheylard, paralyzed, half dead".

"It means that it has need of a thunderbolt?"

"The grand cross, monsieur. They would hesitate to deliver up to us the grand cros."

"You are right, Bernardet. The bank must be in a bad fix, and you are a very keen observer—the mind of a literary man. Bernardet."

"Oh, rather a photographic eye, M. Morel—the habit of using a kodak;"

Thus Bernardet passed his life in Paris. Capable of amassing a fortune in some Tricoche agency if he had widded to exploit, for his own benefit, his keen observing powers, he thought only of doing his duty, bringing up its little girls and loving his wife. Mind Bernardet was amazed at the astonishing to the present the later and very proud that he was such an able man.

M. Bernardet hurried toward M. Rovere's lodgings, and Moniche trutted along beside him. As they neared the sulfs. He bout over and studied it there have they saw that a crewd had begun oughly.

house they now that a crewd had begun to collect.

'It is known already," Moniche said.
"Sinca I left they have begun"—

"If I cater there," interrupted the officer. "it is all right. You have a right to call any one you choose to your aid, but I am not a magistraie. You must go for a commissary of police."

"Oh, M. Bernardet!" Moniche exclaimed. "You are worth more than all the commissaries put together."

"That does not make it so. A commissary is a commissary. Go and hunt for one."

"But since you are hore"—
"But I am nothing. We must have a

"I am simply a police spy."
Then he crossed the street.
The neighbors had gathered about the needs a magistrate."

evecub. A rumer had spread abou evenub. A rumer had spread about which brought together a crowd animated by the morbid curiosity which is aroused in some winds at the hint of a mystery and attracted by that strange magnetism which that chilister thing, "a crime," arouse. The women talked in shrill tones, inventing strange stories and incredition theories. Some of the common people hurried up to learn the lows.

ews.
At the moment Bernardet came up. followed by the concierge, a coupe stopped at the door and a tall man got out, asking: "Where is M. Morel? I wish to see out, asking:

"Where is M. Morel? I wish to see M. Morel."

The chief had not yet been advised, and he was not there. But the tall young man suddenly recognized Bernards and laid hold of him, pulling him after him through the half open door, which Monrobe hastened to shu against the crow!

"We must a! some officers," Bernardet said to the cencierge, "or the crowd will push is."

Muse. Moulehe was standing at the foot of the staircase, surrounded by the lodgers, men and women, to whom she was recounting for the twentish time the story of how she had found M. Rovers with his throat cut.

"I was going in to read the paper—the story—it is very interesting, that start. The monagest had come when the

"I was going in to read the paper—the story—it is very interesting, that story. The moment had come when the baron had insulted the American colonel. M. A. vers said to me only yesterday poor man. I am anxious to find out which ene will be killed—the colonel or the baron." He will never know.
And it is he"—

"Mme. Moniche," interrupted Bernardet, "have you any one whom you can send for a commissary!"

"Any one?"

nardet, "have you any one whom you can send for a commissary?"

"Any one?"

"Yes," added Moniche. "M. Bernardet needs a magistrate. It is not difficult to understand."

"A commissary?" reported Mme. Moniche. "That is so, " commissary, and what if I go fer the commissary myself, M. Bernardet?"

"All right, provided you do not let the crowd take the house by assault when you open the door."

"Fear nothing." the woman said, happy in having something impertant to do, in relating the horrible news to the commissary how, when she was about to enter the room for the purpose of reading, the—

While she was going toward the door Bernardet slowly mounted the two flights of stairs, followed by Moniché and the tall young man who had arrived in his coupe at a gallop is order to get the first news of the snurder and make a "scoop" for his paper.

The news had traveled fast, and his paper had sent him in haste to get all the details of the affair which could be obtained.

The three men reached M. Rovere's obtained.

The three men reached M. Rovere's door. Moniehe unlocked is and stepped back. Bernardet, with the reporter at his heels, notebook in hand, entered the CHAPTER III. CHAPTER III.

Nothing in the antechamber indicated that a tragedy had taken place there. There were pictures on the walls, pieces of faience, some arms of rare kinds, Japanese swords and a Malay creese. Bernardet glanced at them as he passed Japanese swords and a Malay creese. Bernardet glanced at them as he passed by.

"He is in the salon," said the concierge in a low tone.

One of the folding doors stood open, and, stopping on the threshold in order to take in the entire aspect of the place. Bernardet saw in the center of the room, lying on the floor in a pool of blood, the body of M. Bovere, clothed in a long, blue dressing gown, bound at the waist with a heavy cord, which lay in coils on the floor, like a scrpent. The corpse was extended between the two windows which opened on the Boulevard de Clichy, and Bernardet's first thought was that it was a miracle that the vietin could have met žiis death in such a horrible manner two steps from the passersly on the street.

"Whoever struck the blow did it quickly," thought the police officer. He advanced softly toward the body, casting his eye upon the insert mass and taking in at a glance the smallest obfacts near it and the most minute desired the street.

"The others—no." repeated the commissary replied. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd. "The others—no." repeated the commissary replied. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd. "The others—no." There was a murnur from the ecrowd.

mile. He bear over and studied it theroughly.

M. Rovers somed living in his tragic pose. The pale face, with its pelated and well trimmed gray heard, expressed in its fisce immediating accepted in its fisce immediating acceptance of menacing anger. This man of about 50 years had evidently died cursing some one in his supreme agony. The frightful wound seemed like a large red cravat, which harmonized strangely with the half whitened beard, the end of which was wet with blood.

But what struck Bernardes above excepting else, arrested his attention and glued him to the spot was the look, the extraordinary expression in the eyes. The month was onen, as if twory out the way seemed to menace some one, and the lips about to speak.

They were frightful. Those traffer yees were wide open, as if transfined by fear or fury.

A. They seemed in the markets, the eyethowe above them were black and bristing. They seemed living eyes in that dead free. They do a final struggle, of Mone attorious duel of a final struggle, of Mone attorious duel of a final effections immediating, a when they gazed upon the murderer, eye to eye, face to face.

"There ought to be blood under the to the eyes-those wide open eyes, frightful, terrible eyes, which, in their fierce depths, retained without doubt the image or phantom of some nightmare of death. He toucked the dead man's hand. The

He toucted the dead man's hand. The fiesh had become cold, and rigor morits was beginning to set in.

The reporter saw the little man take from his pocket a sort of rusty eiter ribbon and unroll it and heard him tak Moniche to take hold of one end of it. This ribbon or thread looked to Paul Rodier like brass wire. Bernardet prepared his kodak.

"Above averything else," marmured Bernardet, "let us preserve the expres-

Bernardet, "let us preserve the expression of those eyes."
"Close the shutters. The darkness will be more complete."

The reporter assisted Moniche in order to hasten the work. The shutters clessel. to hasten the work. The shutters crees.
the room was quite dark, Bernardet began his task. Counting off a few steps, he selected the best place from which to take the picture.
"Be kind enough to light the end of

"Be kind enough to light the end of the magnesium wire," he said to the concierge. "Have you any matches?"

"No. M. Bernardet."

The police efficer indicated by a sign of the bead a match safe which he had noticed on entering the room.

"There are some there."

Bernardet had with one sweeping lance of the eye taken in everythin in the room—the fautenils, scarcel moved from their places; the pieter hanging on the walls, the mirrors the bookcases, the cabinets, etc.

bookcases, the cabinets, etc.

Moniche went to the mantelpiece ar took a match from the box. It was ?

took a match from the box. It was it Rovere himself who formished the lighty which a picture of his own bod was taken.

"We could obtain no picture in this room without the magnesium wire, said the agent, as calm while taking photograph of the murdered man as it had been, a short fine ago in his god den. "The light is sinsufficient. Whe I say, 'Go!' Moniche, you must light the wire, and I will take three or for negatives. Do you understand? Stan CHAPTER IV. M. Desbriers now began the investigation. He questioned the porter and portress, while he studied the salon in detail. Bernardet reassed about, examining at vary close range each and every object in the room as a dog sniffs and scents about for a trail.

"What kind of a man was your lodger?" was the first question. negatives. Do you understand? Stan there to my left. Now! Attention?" Bernardet took his position, and the "What kind of a man was your long-er?" was the first question.

Moniche replied in a tone which showed that he felt that his tenant had Bernardet took his position, and the porter stood ready, match and wire in hand, like a gunner who awaits the or der to fire.

"Go!" said the agent.

A rapid, clear light shot up and suddenly lighted the room. The pale fact seemed livid, the various objects in the room took ou a fantastic appearance it his sort of tempestuous apotheosis, and Paul Rodier hastily inscribed on his writing pad, "Picturesque, bizarre, many velous, devilish, suggestive."

"Let us try it again," said M. Ber mardet. showed that he felt that his tenant had been accused of something.

"Oh, M. le Commissaire, a very worthy man, I sweat it."

"The best man in the world," added his wife, wiping her eyes.

"I am not inquiring about his moral qualities," M. Desbriere said. "What I want to know is, how did he live and whom did he receive?"

"Few people. Very few," the porter answered. "The poor man liked solitude. He lived here eight years. He received a few friends; but, I repeat, a very small number."

M. Rovere had rented the apartment in 1888. He installed himself in his rooms, with his pictures and books. The porter was much actonished at the num-, ber of pictures and volumes which the

"Let us try it again," said M. Ber mardet.

For the third time in this weire light the visage of the dead man appeared whiter, more sinister, frightful, the wound deeper, the gash redder, and the eyes, those wide open, fixed, tragic menacing, speaking eyes—eyes filled with scorn, with hate, with terror with the ferocious resistance of a last struggle for life, immovable, eloquent—seemed under the fantastic light to glitter, to be alive, to menace some one.

"That is all," said Bernardet very softly. "If with these three negatives"—

He stopped to look around toward the door, which was closed. Some one was raining ringing blows on the door, loud and imperative.

raining ringing blows on the door, loud and imperative.

"It is the commissary. Open the door, Moniche."

The reporter was busy taking notes, describing the salon, sketching it, drawing a plan for his journal.

It was, in fact, the commissary, who was followed by Mme. Moniche and a number of curious persons who had forced their way in when the frent door was opened.

missary. So made a righ to two officers who accompanied him, and they domanded the reporters' sarius of identification. The cencourse of carious one rebelled, protested, growled and declaimed against the representatives of the press, who took precedence everywhers.

"The Fourth Estate!" shouted an odd man from the foot of the staircase. He lived in the house and passed for a correspondent of the institute. He shouted furiously, "When a crime is committed under my very roof, I am not even allowed to write an account of it, and strangers," because they are reporters, can have the exclusive privilege of writing it up."

can have the exclusive privilege of writing it up."

The commissary did not listen to him, but those who were his fellow sufferess applauded him to the egho. The commissary shrugged his affoulders at the hand clappings.

"It is but right," he said to the reporter, "that the agents of the press should be admitted in preference to any to me else. Do you think that it is easy to discover a criminal? I have been a fournalist, too—yes, at times. In the Quartier opeasionally. I have even written a piece for the theater. But we written a piece for the theater, and elegant, amiable, polished, smiling, he looked toward M. Bernardet, and his eyes asked the question, where is sit?

"Tere! M. le Commissaire."

"Tere! M. le Commissaire in from the furn approposehed the body, while the curions ones, quistly keps back by Moniche, formed a half circle around the pale sud bloody corpse. The cenumissary, like Bernardet, was struck by the haughty expressions of that livid face.

"Poor man," he said, shaking his head. "He is superb, superb. He reminds me of the dead Duke de Guiss in Paul Delaroche's picture. I have seen it also at Channilly, in Gerome's celebrated in the pale such control of the dead Duke de Guiss in also at Channilly, in Gerome's celebrated by lieding, or protruiting. Usuand of picture of 'The Duel du Pierot.'"

The commissary is a protructure of 'The Duel du Pierot.'"

The commend the use of Dr. Chase's Ointment, and from what his customers tell him, he knows that the best physicians endormed by the pale such bloody while the course of the story and has never been known to fail to cure the worst forms of this superior officer as a soldier carry in granty and the cruit of the course of the cou rau Denroene's picture. I have seen is also at Chantilly, in Gerome's celebrat-ed picture of 'The Duel du Pierok.'' Possibly in speaking aloud his thoughts the commissary was talking so

He touched the dead man's hand its strong personal characteristics, re-sembled the dead Duke de Guise in Gerome's celebrated picture, which hangs in the galleries at Chantilly."

porter was much astonished at the num-ber of pictures and volumes which the new lodger brought. It took a long time to settle, as M. Rovere was very fastidto sottle, as M. Rovere was very fastidious and personally superintended the hanging of his books. He thought that he must have been an artist, although he said that he was a retired merchant. He had heard him say one day that he had been consul to some foreign country—Spain or South America.

He lived quite simply, although they thought that he must be rich. Was he a missr? Not at all: very generons, on the contrary, but plainly he shunned the world. He had chosen their apartment because it was in a retired spot, the contrary, but plainly he shunned the world. He had chosen their apartment because it was in a retired spet, far from the Parisian boulevards. Four or five years before a woman, clothed in black, had come there—a woman who seemed still young. He had not seen her face, which was covered with a heavy black veil. Spe had visited M. Rovere quite often. He always accompanied her respectfully to the doog when she went away. Once or twice he had gone out with her in a carriage. No, he did not know her name. M. Rovere's life was regulated with military precision. He usually held himself upright. Of late sickness had bowed him somewhat. He went out whenever he was able, going as far as the Bois and back. Then, after hreakfasting, he shut himself up in his library and read and wrote. He passed nearly all of his evenings at home.

"He never made us wait us for him, To be Continued.

To be Continued.

A Strong

Statement

Ointment.

But a True One Regard ing the Wonderful Merits of

Dr. Chase's

cheaply. Saves wear and tear and fool.
Made by the Vacuum Oll Co., under the Vacuum process. Clakes Machinery Run and He touched the dead man's hand. that the reporters might hear him. They stood, notebooks in hand, taking notes, and Paul Rodler, eatching the names, wrote rapidly in his book: "M. Deshriere, the learned commissary, so artistic, so well disposed toward the press, was at one time a journalist. He noticed that the victim's pale face, with the strong purposed learneteristics re-

FARMERS . ment upon your dealer furnishing Vacdian Office and Works VACUUM OIL CO. 5-50 Esplanade East TORON

GURE YOURSELF!

Those peristent neadaches, those dull, heavy generations those wenticones backaches, that ambitionics, dreary condition, means a torpid liver, means your system is out of gear. You need a laxuive, something to desirely the constipation. Take Doe of the system of the constipation. tor Marchaure No. 19 - annih labiste, easy to take and wonderfully efficient. Physicians recommend them. Druggism advact heir use, because they knew what is in them. If you are ill of any disease The Marchaux Co. will give you free advice. Write them fully and freely to third Avenue, Detroit, Mich.

FOR SALE BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Ot manypassed excellence, soph-banaphip and faith. Greater values then the property of the con-tract of the property of the con-tract of the contract of the con-key, the contract of the con-tract, Hair dressing, cutting end-ing, shampooing, breaching, color-ing, etc. Good work by competent hands at bottom prices. W. A. HAINES, 70 Grand River Ave, second door from Suley Ave, De troit. Established 1879

Before. After. Wcca's Phosphodine,
The Great Regista Remety.
Sold and recommended by all druggists in Canada. Only rullable medicine discovered. Els forms of Sexual Weakness, all effects of above or excess install Great and the control of price, one package St. siz. 81. One will please, the self-core. Pamphiets free to any address.
The Wood Company, Windsor, Onl-

Wood's Phosphodine is soid in Chat-ham, at Central Drug Store, C. H. Gunn & Co.

The Maine

Dewey Launder your Shirts, Collars, Cuffs of Hundk-reniefs—if not, why not give up a trial and you won's

Hav-ana

The Parisian Steam Lnundry Co