A Cardinal Sin.

Yes. Frances could easily understand that. Manders paused again—he was weighing every word. He was like a man cutting step by step, a path which would lead he hardly knew where, but which would permit of no retracing; so he had need to be careful.

'In short, I had better say it at once, many a young man, thrown without friends into London, may lead a life which he blushes at afterward, and may associate with persons he can scarcely name.'

Frances could quite believe in the life he hinted at, but was doubtful as to the subsequent blushes.

'I don't want you to think, Mrs. Bourchier,' continued Manders, in charity to himself, 'that I associated with robbers and murderers; but you well understand me when I say that these may have—well, persons associated with them, and these persons may be a connecting link.'

Feeling his candor must be quite convincing he went on courageously.

There, I won't say anything more about it. I am ashamed to be obliged to refer to that period of my life. Now, can you by a stretch of imagination comprehend how in some way things could have come to my knowledge without my having been, as you were good enough to suggest, an accessory to the crime? If not, I will sink all sense of shame and give you details.'

'Please spare the details,' said Frances, coldly. 'I understand.'

She despised the man, but could not help believing he was telling the truth. Unfortunately, she had always underrated him, and thought him devoid of imagination. A low opinion of a rogue's abilities is sometimes greatly to his advantage.

'Thank you.' he said gratefully; and now, Mrs. Bourchier, one thing more. I have never lost sight of this affair—it has weighed like lead on my mind. I can now put you in the way of learning everything—of hanging the murderer, if you wish.

'Of course, I wish it.'

'This knowledge has only been mine within the last few days. I have now got to the bottom of everything—but only under a promise.'

'What promise—quick!' cried Frances. She was growing excited.

'One of the least guilty of the parties concerned must go scot free. I do not even know his name—perhaps I shall never know it. But he will put us on the track, so surely that no one else will escape.'

Manders, as on a former occasion, was growing quite interested in his romance. He spoke in such an impressive way that all his listener's doubts were vanishing.

'Let him go,' she said, 'if it is indispensable.'

'It is. Now only one thing more. I must ask you to pledge yourself to absolute secrecy. To breathe no word of the matter for, say a week—not even to your husband. Will you do this?'

'I cannot see why it is necessary,' said Frances, whose boast was that she had never concealed a thought or an action from Allan.

'It is necessary—my word is given. In a day or two I will, if you promise this, place you face to face with the man I spoke of—the one who is to go free. He can tell everything; but will only tell it to you. From what I learn, the information he can give will be ample. Then he must be allowed a few days' grace to get away, and you may put the whole matter in your solicitor's hands.'

'Why not come to Mr. Trenfield, my solicitor, and take his advice?'

'Because I am under the same pledge that I wish you to take.'

Frances sat silent. Secrecy was her aversion. Manders rose.

'It must be as you like,' he said, 'but I can do no more in the matter. Even if you tried all legal methods to make me speak, it would be no good. I can tell nothing except what I have told you—can reveal no names, describe no persons, but the alarm will be given, and all chance of justice at an end.

A strong, a burning desire to make the murderers of her kind father pay the penalty due came over Frances. After all she had but to keep silent for a few days. With the end in view, there could be no harm in doing so.

'Then I promise,' she said.

'Faithfully—without reservation?'

'Faithfully and truly—not even my husband shall know.'

'I will put things in trim at once. I will write to you. You must hold yourself in readiness to come where I shall tell you. You are brave, not a coward?'

'I think I am as brave as most women.'

'Then, when I write, come at once; make no delay, as moments may be precious. You need not be afraid, as wherever you go I shall accompany you.'

'Let it be as soon as possible,' said Frances. I shall be thinking of nothing else.'

'Oh yes, you will. You will change your mind, perhaps, within half an hour. You will hear me traduced, abused, and, it may be, say I am deceiving you. But I am not in this thing. Anyway, you will get a letter from me within the next two days; if you don't follow its instructions, I shall know the reason why, and there's an end of it. It's your concern not mine.'

'I have not the slightest idea what you are talking about,' said Frances.

'Of course not. I'll let some one else enlighten you after I've gone. It won't be long before you understand. Do you remember my name?'

'Certainly—George Manders.'

'Yes—to you it was. You'll hear me called by another name soon. That will be my true name.'

She was perfectly mystified; no suspicion of the true facts dawned on her.

'Very well,' said Manders,' never mind now; but when I write to you, come or not, as you choose. Believe everything bad you hear about me, except that I am an impostor. It's too long a tale to tell now; I'll tell it next time we meet. And believe that in this I am anxious to serve you; for hanging the man who killed your father doesn't matter much to me—does it?'

'I suppose not,' said Frances; 'but it does to me.'

'Then trust me in this, and I'll show you how to do it. I'm everything that's bad—a drunkard and all the rest of it; but you may trust me.'

Then he left hastily, and Frances sat down to think over his words. There was no reason, so far as she could see, why she should not trust him. He had even loved her once; fortunately, he appeared to have cured himself of that folly. He could not have called upon her for sentimental reasons. His tale had been fairly credible; the very hints he had let drop as to the way in which he had acquired his knowledge seemed to comfirm his words. She had no doubt but that the life he had led upon his arrival in London had been a vicious one, and she had little belief in his conventional expression of regret. His explanation of his extraordinary behavior was a trifle lame, but she wished to believe him—she wished ardently to see her father's murderers within the grasp of the law. Whatever he may have done, whatever she might hear in his disfavor, it seemed clearly in his power to bring this about. Yes, in spite of everything, she would trust the man so far. He could have no motive in deceiving her about this particular thing. Having made up her mind, she went in search of Josephine.

Josephine was in her room, the door of which she had locked and bolted. Frances knocked at it.

'Let me in, dear,' she said.

'Who is it?' asked Josephine, cautiously.

'It is I—Frances.'

'Are you quite alone—no one with you?'

'No; I am quite alone. Open the door.'

'You give me your word there is no one with you?'

Frances wondered if her guest were losing her senses.

'Of course I am alone if I tell you so,' she said, feeling much annoyed at the doubt expressed.

Josephine opened the door timidly; but before she admitted Frances, glanced up and down the landing. Seeing no sign of the enemy, she let her visitor enter, taking the precaution of relocking the door after her.

'What are you afraid of?' asked Frances, smiling.

'Is he gone? Oh, say he is gone!'

'Is who gone?'

It seemed impossible that Josephine should be referring to George Manders.

'The wretched man you have been talking to so long.'

Josephine spoke almost scornfully.

'Yes, he has just left. He was and old acquaintance, whom I have not seen for some years. What is the matter Josephine?'

For Josephine had risen, and was looking her full in the face with an expression which puzzled her greatly.

'Oh!' she exclaimed, 'Frances, why did you tell me over and over again you had never seen him! Yet, as soon as he comes, you are ready to rush into his arms."

'Please explain yourself,' said Frances, quietly. 'I am not in the habit of rushing into his arms.'

'I have been doing all I can to keep out of his way, and as soon as he comes here you welcome him, and call him an old friend,'

'Josephine, you are losing your senses. What in the world has the gentleman who called to see me to do with you?'

'Everything, unfortunately; being the man I despise most in the world—my husband.'

'Your husband!'

'Yes, my husband, Digby Bourchier; the man you had never seen.'

Frances felt incredulous.

'Josephine,' she said, 'It is impossible; you are making a mistake.'

'I am sorry to say I know him too well to make a mistake. Did he not want to see me?'

'He never even mentioned your name.

'Then what did he come for?'

'He came to see me,' said Frances, who was beginning to understand the mysterious words spoken by Manders just before leaving her.

'Josephine,' she asked, 'you are certain you are right?'

'I am as certain as I am his wife. It's nonsense talking like this. What did he want?'

Francis did not answer this question.

'When I knew him,' she said, 'he went by the name of——Well, another name entirely. I can't understand it.'

'I dare say he's gone by twenty names.'

'Yet it was your father who introduced him to you as your cousin, Digby Bourchier.

'Yes, but papa may have been deceived. Oh, Frances I am awfully distressed that you should know him, or have any dealings with him. Tell me all you know about him.'

Frances mused; the whole matter was growing very complicated. She could not explain her connection with Josephine's husband without telling her everything; and she had bound herself to secrecy, for a few days at any rate. She was thinking over all she knew about Manders, and wondered whether his assertions, that the name she would find he bore was his rightful one, was true. He might be a bad man without being an imposter. He might be the hero of a romance, and have found since they parted that his birth was different to what it was always thought to be. No, she would tell Josephine nothing—she would even, although she regretted the promise, tell Allen nothing until the week had passed by. She raised her eyes and looked gravely at Josephine, who was anxiously awaiting her reply.

'I am more perplexed and astonished than I can describe,' she said. 'I have reasons for telling you no more at present, than that this man, your husband, when I knew him was in a totally different position of life. We were thrown together and knew each other intimately for a long time. By and by I will tell you his history as far as I know it, but I can't for a while say anything more about him.'

'Of course I shall tell Allan he came,' said Josephine, with a dissatisfied air.

Frances reflected.

'I would rather you did not mention it; as for a few days I should be bound to give Allan the same answer I give you.'

Josephine felt the old mistrust, which she had never thoroughly conquered, rising again.

'I think Allan ought to know exactly who your old friends are,' she said, in such a way that Frances looked both pained and surprised.'

'Then tell him, by all means,' she said, coldly.'

Josephine saw that she had vexed her.

'Oh, Frances!' she cried, "don't be cross with me; I am so unhappy, and afraid of you. You won't let him come here again, will you? If I am troubling you by staying here, I will go away to Shortlands or to Redhills! but don't let my husband come here again.' Frances melted at the little woman's grief. She took her in her arms and kissed her.

'No,' she said, 'be quite easy about that. He shan't come here again.'

'When does Allan come back?' asked Josephine, presenetly.

'The day after to-morrow, I hope. We shall get a letter in the morning.'

'I wish he were here now,' said Josephine.

'So do I,' said Frances; and Josephine felt easier as she heard her wish echoed so sincerely.

Good Advice.

DEAR SIRS,—I have been troubled with headache for over 40 years, and had it so bad about once a week that I was sometimes not expected to live. I was advised to use B. B. B., and have used three bottles. I now have an attack once in four or five months, and feel that if I continue using it I will be entirely cured. Therefore I recommend it highly.

Miramichi Advance.

Beginning with the issue of November 6th, 1890, when the ADVANCE entered upon its Seventeenth Year of Publication!

The publisher made an important change in the terms on which the paper isfurnished to Subscribers. These include

1st. Strict adherence to the system of cash in advance for all subscriptions.

2nd. The reduction of the price of the paper to

One Dollar a Year!

It is to be particularly understood that all outstanding subscription accounts due after November 6th, 1890, are to be settled on the old terms, viz., $2 per year, the advertised credit rate.

I have made special arrangements with the

WEEKLY TELEGRAPH OF ST JOHN

—AND THE—

FAMILY HERALD AND WEEKLY STAR

of Montreal by which I will furnish either of those papers and the

'ADVANCE"

TOGETHER AT

One Dollar and Sixty Cents a Year!

—0—

I have made the foregoing changes in the business of the ADVANCE for two reasons.

The first is because many patrons who have been given credit, have abused the privilege to such an extent as to make the business of publishing the paper a non-paying one, and it is necessary, in my own interest and that of those who do pay, that I should no longer continue to furnish the ADVANCE to those non-paying subscribers.

The second reason is, that I wish to meet the competition of the city weeklies, which are made up from the type of the dailies and, therefore, cost little for production in comparison with a local paper like the ADVANCE, the type of which must be set up especially for it.

Having published the ADVANCE for sixteen years, and endeavored to make it a creditable representative of Miramichi and North Shore enterprise—a paper which may be taken into any household without fear that it has catered to sensationalism at the sacrifice of that cleanliness of matter, which is too often neglected by the press of the day—I have reason to hope the foregoing announcement will meet with general approval and be the means of largely increasing the circulation and influence of the paper.
