simply grown-up children. Lord Dun-more and a friend made a voyage up country to see a tribe of Kanakas, who were amusing themselves by riding on a merry-go-round. Their chief, a tall, stately man of magnificent proportions, stood apart, gravely watching his men enjoy themselves. Lord Dunmore's companion walked up to the chief, and, pointing out the Earl, said: "He big chief!"

"Kanaka no savvy that!" said the onlooker, "'He big chief!"

"No!" rejoined the native in awe.

"Kanaka no savvy that. He sanguinary big chief. At least that is as near the real expression as may be given.

the real expression as may be given. A STRANGE BALL.

One of Lord Dunmore's employees had a funny experience up-country. He decided not to wait for the boat, but to strike land, and inspect a certain mine.

As Kanakas do not care much for ordinary currency, he was advised to take out a lot of Jew's harps, and mouth-organs, which he could easily exchange for food. But, to his disgust, when he arrived at his destination, he found that a rival prospector had set out two days before him with a similar stock, and had swamped the market. He had to buy fruit and chickens exorbitant prices by promissory notes on a certain firm, which all New Caledonian natives will take, and this was aggravated by the fact that every was aggravated by the fact that every glade through which he passed during the next three days was ringing with the joyful noise of Jews' harps and mouth-organs.

Shortly before his departure from the island Lord Dunmore gave a tall, which in one respect was the strangest ever given. It was held in a large galvanized iron warehouse, draped galvanized of the deep out as a hallroom. galvanized iron warehouse, draped with flags and fitted out as a ballroom. Here two hundred men and women met to dance to the strains of a splendid band dressed in the grey uniform of the convict. Every member of the orchestra was still "doing time." Below the band-stand sat a group of warders with loaded revolvers in their belts, all ready to "draw" on the band, if the convicts misbehaved.

DIABOLICAL DROLLERY.

"It was very much reminiscent of the old mining camp legend, 'Do not shoot the planist; he is doing his best!' " declared an eye witness of this strange scene to the writer. "Although the revolvers were in the warders' belts, my imagination gould see only a bond of imagination could see only a band of very thoughtful musicians, playing with unusual care and expression, with unusual care and expression, be-cause rising above the score, and the bandmaster's baton—the 'chef d'or-chestra' was 'the hardest case' in the whole band—was a ring of revolvers ready to blow them into smithereens if they played so much as one note out of tune.

"There was a diabolical drollery in the picture. Every member of the orchestra was a good musician, and some of them had belonged to the best bands in Europe ere they came out to Noumena, and their playing in the public square twice a week was much contract by the populace; but I think. enjoyed by the populace; but I think, this is the first time that an orchestra of convicts ever played at a public ball given by one of the oldest and proudest members of the British aristocracy."

The gentleman who gives this vivid account was specially invited by Lord Dunmore to act as stewart for the

A despatch from Digby states that Thos. Clifford of Tiverton left his home Tuesday morning in a small boat for the fishing grounds. The boat was propelled by a small gasoline engine. When the fisherman had not returned to port when a strong wind sprung up, it was feared he was drowned. The weather became thick and a party with fog horns searched until late Tuesday night and continued yesterday morning. At 10.30 o'clock the missing fisherman was sighted off Brier Island and rescued. The electrical ignition failed to work the engine in his boat, he lost his anchor and was left at the mercy.

Autoist Rips Up Tornado and Saves Towns — Storm Drives Words Down Throat of Scotting Planter-Breeze Plays Touching Tune.

AUTOIST SMASHES
TORNADO TO PIECES.
ROARING FURNACE, Pa., April 29.
—Michael Robinson, figured in a unique experience one day last week driving his forty-horsepower machine over the gineer, who had a narrow escape from death.

his forty-horsepower machine over the country roads.

He was running along easily and was about to descend a steep hill when he observed a tornado approaching him. It was of the spiral variety and looked most terrifying. To attempt to escape was impossible since he knew he could easily be overtaken. To remain where he was also not to be thought of. He decided to take a desperate chance, and putting on all speed, dashed directly toward the tornado. Descending the hill be had the advantage of greater momentum, while the tornado was greatly hampered by dimbing up the steep grade.

Mr. Robinson says that his car hit the tornado squarely. The impact was so great that the crank and part of the hood were torn away. At the same time the tornado was hurled back several feet, and before it could gather new force Robinson had sent his faithful car at it once more.

This time he broke it into smitherenens. It was a hopeless wreck incapable of doing any further harm.

Friends of the brave man congratulated him upon his act, and several towns in the path of the storm and which surely would have been wiped out, adopting resolutions commending him as a hero.

CHOKED TO DEATH
BY HIS OWN WORDS. AYRLIES, Ga., April 29.—There was a sort of poetic justice associated with the death of Simon Swift, during the tornado. Swift was a painter, and often boasted that he did not fear either wind, lightning or fire, and it was his delight during a thunderstorm to sit on the eaves of his roof and defy the elements.

CAKE SHATTERS

CHURCH STEEPLE.

HURRICANE, Pa., April 29.—There are many instances recorded of straws carried by the wind, penetrating timber and even brick walls, but even more remarkable example of the freakish things done by tornadoes were noted here yesterday.

A spongecake carried away from a wrecked bakery, was hurled through the air with such deadly velocity that when it struck a church steeple it wrecked the structure as though it had been built of paper.
