

dignity and worth of human personality.

In the work of peacemaking there is a growing realization that peace is not made at a single conference, but that it is only won slowly, as the war was won, by a combined effort over a wide front, and by the employment of all the means at our disposal.

Mr. President, your visit to Canada today will emphasize to the people of Canada and the United States that the friendship between our two countries is a precious inheritance. History shows few examples of a large and powerful community living at peace for over one hundred and twenty years with a smaller and independent neighbour. Yet, this relationship was achieved only by conscious and painstaking effort and by the gradual emergence of a tradition of negotiation and peaceful settlement. In each generation our two peoples have faced issues no less serious than many of the conflicts between nations which are in the headlines of the world press today. What is important is that these issues, territorial, political and economic, have been met squarely and solved, not on the basis of power politics, but by the open and orderly processes of cooperation and, when necessary, by judicial settlement.
